Oil Shortage Laid to Lack Of Official Coordination

Petroleum Supply In East Declared Nation's Most Critical Problem

May Hit Civilian Defense

Chilly Days Ahead

By Ben W. Gilbert
Post Staff Writer

Thousand of Eastern householders now face a chill winter with inadequate oil to heat their homes properly because of the failure of responsible Government officials to coordinate their activities and develop a program to control the consumption of petroleum, a high Government source charged yesterday.

The current petroleum supply situation was described as the most critical problem facing the Nation today. The Government official asserted that it could easily become worse because of the present lack of control over the uses to which petroleum is put, leaving many homes with considerably less fuel than the present rationed allotments.

Drastic Measures Needed

Rationing of oil and gasoline to consumers has not proved a sufficient control because it does not discriminate between users and prevent diversion of stocks to nonessential purposes, it was said.

The oil situation today was compared to the steel situation months ago, when some war plants were faced with shutdowns and slowdowns because of lack of steel, even though the United States has the largest steel-producing capacity in the world.

Drastic measures to control the uses of steel have to a large extent relieved the supply situation, with further improvement expected when the WPB controlled materials plan gets into full operation. No similar plan to control petroleum and make sure that oil does not flow away into nonessential channels has been devised, it was said.

Tank Car Capacity Taxed Now

The oil situation was described as more critical than the problems of manpower control and food control. All three problems have been laid before the President for solution recently.

Control over oil is divided among the War Production Board, which has power to limit consumption by direct order; the Office of Petroleum Coordinator, responsible for overall planning and the Office of Price Administration, which rations petroleum products.

The official stated that the War Production Board now has authori-

Living Cost Found Highest in D. C., New York Is Next

The Labor Department last night made public its estimates of the cost of living on a "maintenance level" for a four-person manual worker's family in 33 cities, ranging from $1731.88 in Washington, to $1433.72 in Mobile, Ala.

The department established a "standard budget" for a moderately active man who works in overalls, his wife, a boy, age 13, and a girl, age 8, and compared the costs of living in the 33 cities for such a family. It described "maintenance level" as above the "minimum of subsistence" level but below the standards of skilled workers.

The second highest cost of living was recorded for New York, where the standard budget amounted to $1722.72, and San Francisco was third with $1717.18, or 99.2 per cent of the Washington figure.

More Policy Changes by WLB?

Does the country face another radical change in the methods of collective bargaining? The War Labor Board at present is urged to change the policy under which collective bargaining now operates. What is this new action? Will it affect our War Effort? What influence would it have on the individual worker? Leo Wolman bares the facts about this proposed action in an article entitled "Industry-Wide Collective Bargaining" in Section II of today's Post.

The ceremony took place between halves of the Maryland-Washington and Lee game yesterday at College Park. Bill Stevens is in the driver's seat of a carriage in which she was driven around the stadium. Miss Bond's home is 36 Drummond Avenue, Chevy Chase, Md.

Frankie Sinkwich and his supposedly invincible Georgia eleven were victims of the most startling football upset of several seasons yesterday when five-times beaten and once-tied Auburn shackled the Bulldogs, 27 to 13.

Boston College took its time in beating Boston University, 37 to 0, and rolled along unbeaten with Georgia Tech and Tulsa. Tech was hard pressed to beat Florida, 20-7, while Tulsa had unexpected trouble in winning, 33-10, over Creighton. William and Mary left the Nation's unbeaten list as North Carolina Pre-Flight scored twice in the fourth period in a 14-0 triumph.

Locally, Georgetown was in command all the way in defeating George Washington, 21-0, before one of the smallest crowds in the history of the series. Maryland's breather against Washington and Lee turned out to be a breath-taker, the Old Liners winning, 32-28.

Ohio State clinched the Western Conference title with a 21-7 victory over Michigan, while Wisconsin hopped on Minnesota, 20-6, to take over the runner-up spot.

Yale is the Big Three champion, a long pass in the fourth quarter beating Harvard, 7-3. Army routed Princeton, 40-7.

Coffee 'Frozen'

U. S. Begins To Feel Pinch Of Rationing

Wartime rationing—which hasn't really hurt much up to now—began to look drastic yesterday as Government officials took steps which are expected to make Mr. and Mrs. Average American feel the pinch of shortages for the first time.

Starting at 12:01 a. m. today, coffee left the list of "free" commodities and became frozen for a week pending formal institution of rationing which will leave the average coffee drinker with a cup a day of the beverage.

Simultaneously, the basic "A" gasoline ration dropped from 4 gallons a coupon to 3 gallons along the entire East Coast, the result of a nacute deficit in petroleum supplies because of transportation difficulties.

At the same time the Office of Price Administration moved to bring the country's 300,000 boarding houses, restaurants, hotels, clubs, hospitals and institutions under stricter rationing control by requiring them to keep accurate records of the amount of food served during the month of December—the dollar volume of food business done, along with the number of males served during the month.

These records designed to "give a clear picture of the needs of public and private group eating places" will also provide OPA with information needed in developing additional rationing programs.

Meanwhile, the War Department announced that large Army orders for white goods would absorb virtually all stocks on hand of popular quality sheets and bath towels in certain sizes, but that stocks for civilian demand should be back to normal in March. Stocks now in the hands of retailers were not affected.

Sizes to be absorbed by the Army were sheets in 63, 72, and 81 inch

Lehman Named War Relief Administrator

N. Y. Governor's Job To Parallel That Held By Hoover in 1918

By the Associated Press

President Roosevelt yesterday placed Gov. Herbert H. Lehman of New York in charge of distribution of American food, clothing and medicine to the people of lands occupied by troops of the United Nations.

Indicating that the President wishes an early start made on this task, the White House announced that Lehman will resign his gubernatorial post about December 3. His term would normally expire on January 1. He did not seek re-election.

In an interview at his New York home tonight, the 64-year-old Governor asserted that as he visualizes the problem of his new post "it will extend away beyond the end of the war—this rebuilding of countries occupied and destroyed."

"The President's program of relief and rehabilitation is another step which will make it possible for the United States, in association with the other United Nations, to render an immediate and effective further contribution to the winning of the war and to the solution of post-war problems," he added.

The problems facing him "are all very new," and his first job will be to set up an organization in Washington, Lehman said. Asked if his work would also be "in the field," he replied, "I'll gladly go to any part of the world where I am needed."

The appointment implements an announcement made by the White House a week ago that no one in a territory occupied by American troops would be allowed to go hungry if it was humanly possible to supply food.

The same announcement told of an order that not only food and clothing, but arms and ammunition

Fifth Traffic Death in 5 Days Brings New Police Warning

Death of a 70-year-old bricklayer—the fifth District traffic fatality in as many days—and a series of accidents which injured nine persons, one of them critically last night led police officials to warn pedestrians and motorists against carelessness in crossing streets or driving.

Citing an almost 200 per cent increase in deaths due to streetcars and buses this year, Inspector Arthur E. Miller, District traffic supervisor, said a concentration of traffic law enforcement against these vehicles is imperative.

"The problem, too, is one of careless walking," he asserted, "but the public transit companies are greatly responsible for our increased toll this year."

Yesterday's victim—William H. Woodend, 70, of 121 Twelfth Street Southeast—died at Emergency Hospital. He was struck Thursday by a Capital Transit Co. streetcar in the 500 block Ninth Street Northwest.

The trolley, police said, was operated by Paul B. Wise, 25, of 719 Kentucky Avenue Southeast. He will appear at a coroner's inquest, the date of which has not been set.

Roosevelt War Powers Bill Approved

Rigid Immigration Safeguards, Time Limits Are Provided By House Group

By Edward Ryan
Post Staff Writer

A blanket grant of new powers for the President to suspend laws and cut through legalistic red tape found to be impeding the war effort was recommended by a House Ways and Means subcommittee yesterday.

The subcommittee specified, however, that the proposed authority to suspend tariff, immigration and other statutes would continue until the end of next year, the end of the war, or Congress takes it back—whichever happens first.

On immigration, the committee wrote in a ban against any breakdown in the present quota system for admitting aliens for permanent residence in this country, and said that any alien brought in under the proposed law must leave the country six months after it expires.

Earlier Plan Sidetracked

In proposing a sweeping grant of new authority for the President, safeguarded by the time limits and immigration provisos, the subcommittee sidetracked the plan proposed earlier by some members that Congress be asked to write its own directory of the statutes which might be suspended.

This decision was based mainly, it was understood, on testimony that to compile all the laws involved in some of the war tieups protested by Government, civilian and military leaders would have required listing several hundred statutes or sections of statutes.

Representative Jere Cooper (Democrat), of Tennessee, chairman of the subcommittee, announced that the proposed draft of war powers legislation had received unanimous approval. It will be taken back Tuesday to the full Ways and Means Committee, which tabled the first Administration-sponsored proposal as being too broad, and which ordered Cooper's seven-member group to prepare another.

Recommendations Heeded

Cooper emphasized that the legislative draft was the committee's own bill, and that it had been drawn on the basis of recommendations from the War and Navy Departments, and other key war agencies.

"We believe it gives the assistance the Army and Navy and war agencies vitally need and should have," remarked Cooper, "and at the same time properly protects and safeguards the use of these discretionary powers."

Cooper explained that the immigration provision included extra safeguards in that one or more aliens could be admitted to this country through a suspension of the laws only upon recommendation from the head of a war agency. The President would be permitted to designate the agencies whose chiefs could recommend special admission of aliens.

In turn, the ageney chief would have to determine that the aliens to be admitted were necessary for the war effort, and formally request that they be allowed to come to this country.

Aside from the congressional safeguards, the bill would empower the President in general to suspend any or all of the laws and regulations which he might find impeding

2-Ton Bombs And Incendiaries Leave Blanket Of Flame Over City

By E. B. Sullivan
Associated Press Staff Writer

London, Nov. 21.—A fiery raid on Turin, the R. A. F.'s heaviest so far in its growing offensive against Italy, spread such a blanket of fire over the northern arsenal city Friday night that the raiders had difficulty finding clear spaces for targets, the British disclosed today.

This assault was comparable in size to an "average" raid on Germany, usually carried out by between 200 and 300 planes, well-inforced sources believed.

After giving Turin, the home of Italy's Fiat Caproni bomber plants and other war works, only two nights of respite from devastating two-ton bombs, a heavy R. A. F. group returned in good weather, and indicative of the punishment loosed on the city, one bomber group alone dropped 54 two-ton bombs and 110,000 pounds of incendiaries in less than an hour. This was an average of one two-ton bomb a minute and one 30-pound incendiary a second.

Three Planes Missing

So thorough was the job, the Air Ministry said, that the captain of one four-engined Halifax which reached Turin about midway in the attack said he had to make four "dummy runs" before his bombardier could pick out clear spots at which to aim.

Three of the bombers were missing, a communique said.

German fighters were aloft all the way from the French coast deep into southern France, the Air Ministry said, but in spite of weather made-to-order for interception—thick clouds below the bombers and a bright moon above them—the Nazis had "little success."

Three unsuccessful attacks were made on a relatively slow Lancaster in which an R. A. F. wing commander was flying.

The Rome communique said, "incendiary bombs in great quantities fell in the center of Turin, caused fires and damage, killed 29 persons and wounded 120."

Claim Morale Shaken

British observers said such mass raids were proving an economical way to strike at the foundations of Italy's war strength and that in one month they had severely shaken civilian morale in northern Italy.

This was the fourth raid in eight nights on Italy and the tenth raid, including one in daylight, in which the R. A. F. has smashed at such key centers as Genoa, Milan, Savona and Turin since October 22.

The planes lost Friday night raised to only 20 the total announced by the R. A. F. as the cost of the month-long offensive.

15 Raid-Free Days

London, Nov. 21 (AP).—Britain rounded out tonight 15 raid-free days and nights—the longest respite since the big night attacks were halted in May, 1941. The last bombing was on November 6 when a single raider was over the East Anglian coast by day.

Well and In Good Spirits

Couldn't Go For Raw Fish, Rickenbacker Tells Reporter

(Here for the first time, is the story of the rescue of Capt. Eddie Rickebacker from the waters of the South Pacific. War Secretary Stimson announced after Rickenbacker was found that the Nation must wait until the ace felt he was sufficiently recovered from the ordeal to tell of his experiences.)

By the Associated Press

Somewhere in the South Pacific, Nov. 14 (Delayed).—Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker, safe after 25 days lost at sea, said today he never doubted that he and his companions would be rescued.

Sure of his faith in the Golden Rule, his "own religion," he turned to Pvt. John F. Bartek, one of his companions in the ordeal, and said:

"You'd better thank God for your Testament, son. You can see now what faith can do for you."

His remark to Bartek was made as they arrived on this atoll in the dark, early morning hours yesterday, Friday, the thirteenth.

Rickenbacker and seven companions flying the South Pacific were forced down October 21 when their big Army plane ran out of gas during an inspection flight.

(A joint Army and Navy release from Pearl Harbor said today that advices from the South Pacific base where Capt. Edward V. Rickenbacker and his companions were taken after their rescue indicated that the entire party was recovering satisfactorily and that the flying ace was in "high spirits," the United Press reported.)

The flier, known almost as well for his many escapes in air mishaps as for his record as America's premier ace of the last World War, talked more of other subjects than of his experiences on a tiny rubber life raft, from which he and two companions were rescued by a Navy flying boat.

He said he knew of the planned American landings in Africa, which occurred November 7 while Rickenbacker was floating on the sea, because "my dear friend Jimmy Doolittle was going to be in charge of the air supporting forces."

At this point a Medical Corps man who helped care for the six survivors—one of the men died before rescue—said that he'd heard that one evening while the men were on the raft a seagull alighted on Rickenbacker's head.

All the survivors agreed that they found raw seagulls very tasty, indeed.

Rickenbacker corroborated the seagull story, adding:

Military 'Grab' Of Manpower Control Feared

Bipartisan Demand To Keep It Civilian Rises in Congress

A showdown on whether civilian or military authorities should have the job of mobilizing America's industrial manpower appeared imminent yesterday as bipartisan congressional sources voiced demands that control of our labor force be left in civilian hands.

Simultaneously, Chairman Paul V. McNutt, of the War Manpower Commisison, launched a large-scale manpower control experiment on the West Coast which may well prove the test of the ability of civilian agencies to do the job.

McNutt announced that he had approved a plan drawn up by a West Coast management-labor committee covering California, Washington, Oregon, Nevada and Arizona to mobilize and use all available labor in the area.

Both Senator Claude Pepper (Democrat) of Florida and Senator Robert Taft (Republican) of Ohio urged congressional action to centralize manpower control in civilian hands.

Taft told reporters that he saw a trend in recent Administration actions toward placing manpower control into the hands of the military. He said that he would vigorously oppose any such development.

Effort to End Labor Piracy

Pepper, who heads a subcommittee investigating the problem, asserted that military control over manpower "would be a case of the tail wagging the dog."

"After all, the Army represents only a small sector of the whole

Rommel Army Makes Agheila For Last Stand

Scrambles Into Defile Closely Pursued By British Forces

By Edward Kennedy
Associated Press Staff Writer

Cairo, Nov. 21.—Striking swiftly beyond newly captured Bengasi, the British Eighth Army squeezed Marshal Rommel's pommeled Africa Corps into the approaches of the El Agheila defile tonight in a race to deliver a knockout to the hapless Axis survivors before they could burrow into the natural defenses of that 30-mile-wide Libyan coastal strip.

British forward elements, now more than half way to Tunisia from their starting point at El Alamein in Egypt, caught up with the Axis rear guard at Agedabia, some 70 miles from El Agheila yesterday. With the Eighth Army maintaining its average advance of 30 miles a day, it appeared that the showdown clash on the heretofore unbreached El Agheila line was only a matter of hours away.

Position Perilous

Rommel was believed already to have gotten the main body of his broken army into the El Agheila area, which lies on the Gulf of Sirte along the border between Tripolitania and Cirenaica.

With most of his tanks gone and with another opposing army behind him in Tunisia, his position was a perilous one despite El Agheila's strong points. But in all probability another major campaign with heavy fighting will have to be fought before the Axis is driven out of Africa.

Regardless of what Rommel does now, his headlong flight before the Civil Service Plans Job Shifts To Bring Greater Efficiency

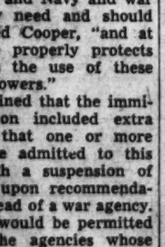
By Jerry Kluttz

A mass trading of jobs among Federal workers is in prospect. The object will be to get the employes nearer their places of employment. Responsibility for the job swap will be placed in the War Transfer Unit of the Civil Service Commission. An announcement is expected this week. Employes who want to trade jobs will be asked to register at the unit, which is located at 801 E Street Northwest. The unit will arrange the swaps. It'll concentrate first among employes who must now spend several hours each day going and coming from work in the suburbs.



The Census and Navy agencies at Suitland, the Agriculture bureaus at Beltsville, the Navy at Arlington, and the Public Health Service at Bethesda will be among the first to be affected. Moreover, the unit will make a study of the commuting of Federal workers between Washington and Baltimore. Hundreds do it daily to work for Social Security in Baltimore and hundreds of Baltimoreans come here to work each day. The unit will be ordered to cut this down by arranging for job swaps. It's a grand idea and it can work well if everyone cooperates.

Incidentally the E Street unit has been overhauled in an effort to give better service to Federal workers who are dissatisfied with their jobs and desire transfers. Formerly, employes who went to the unit were given questionnaires to fill out and that's all. The papers piled up and action was delayed. The employes naturally thought they were forgotten. But under the new procedure the employes will get direct action. They'll make out the questionnaires and then they'll be sent direct to an interviewer. Spot action will be given and cases will be cleared up in a matter of hours or, at most, a matter of days.

Job Transfer Procedure

The transfer unit will follow these broad principles: (1) An unhappy employe in a high priority agency won't be transferred outside that agency. Instead, the unit will attempt

66 Additional Business Firms Give Lift to War Fund Drive

The Community War Fund drive gained much-needed vitality yesterday when it was announced 66 additional business firms had complete response to appeals for donations.

Up until yesterday, there were still 114 firms in five Washington areas which had not reported. An effort will be made during the next 36 hours to have these reports ready when the drive ends at noon Tuesday.

Among the important institutions to go over the top in the drive are District hotels and parochial schools, according to Arthur Harnett and the Rev. Father Thomas B. Dade, hotel and school committee executives.

Paul D. Sleeper, group solicitation unit vice chairman, said a new spirit of enthusiasm had been injected into the whole group.

Interest in putting the drive over the top was manifest by a number of business men when they telephoned to campaign headquarters in the Willard Hotel and asked that fund key men be sent to their establishments to address the workers there.

Still others telephoned to announce they were certain of reach-

Showdown Near

By the Associated Press

London (Sunday), Nov. 22.—A French assault on German dugouts in the hastily erected Nazi defense arc around Tunis and Bizerte, with the result still undetermined, and the capture by Allied advance units of an important cross-roads in the Tunis area were reported early today from North Africa, where powerful Allied forces are moving rapidly to smash the beleaguered Axis Tunisian troops.

Allies Progress Methodically

Reports from Allied force headquarters indicated that the fighting is hourly growing in intensity, with the Germans and Italians bracing themselves for the imminent fight against the main body of British, American and French troops.

A steady stream of men and material was moving eastward as far west as Casablanca against the Germans and Italians, cut off from all retreat except by sea or air.

Reports from the Allied headquarters indicated that the British, American and French spearheads had seized the cross-roads and driven the Germans back. The gain in this struggle included a bridge.

Then the Germans dug in and the reports said the French immediately and violently assailed their positions.

French Block Junction

The German defense arc around Bizerte, with its important military airdrome, was believed to run somewhere east of Tabarca, on the north coast, to Hammamet, southeast of Tunis. At the nearest points the Allied advance forces have been reported within 30 miles of both Bizette and Tunis.

It was reported that the Germans have patrols constantly on the watch behind their contracting lines, apparently on guard against a French uprising in that sector.

Pro-Allied French forces were said to be in control of Gabes, on the eastern Tunis coast thus effectively blocking any connection between the Tunisian Axis armies and Marshal Rommel's harried soldiers in Libya.

Paratroops In Action

The German radio also reported that a fighting French-American column was moving up from the south of Tunisia, aiming to strike the coast at Sousse, below Hammamet, which Berlin quoted Spanish Morocco sources as saying had been reached by Allied forces

Friend Tells How Giraud Fled Prison

Narrow Escape

Timberlake's Plane Riddled By Gunfire

GEN. PATRICK TIMBERLAKE

By the Associated Press

Cairo, Nov. 21.—Brig. Gen. Patrick Timberlake, chief of the United States Army Air Force bomber command in the Middle East, narrowly missed being shot down by Axis fighters when he was returning from one of the longest bombing flights of the war, it was disclosed today.

More than 70 bullet and cannon shell holes were counted in the plane in which he was a passenger. Part of its rudder was destroyed and made useless and an engine went dead, but was restarted.

Two crewmen were wounded, but the general escaped unhurt.

Timberlake was in a formation of four-motored Liberator B-24's, which barely had turned back from the target when it drew heavy anti-aircrarft fire and was attacked by several Messerschmitts.

One enemy fighter was shot down and another probably was destroyed.

Timberlake paid special tribute to the senior officers leading the flight, Col. Hugo P. Rush of Lancaster, Pa., and Col. George F. McGuire of Coffeyville, Kans. It was Capt. Paul H. Francis of Los Angeles who elected to land the plane despite the damage.

Made Rope of Scraps; Civilian Clothes Were Smuggled In

By Phil Ault
United Press Staff Writer

Oran, Algiers, Nov. 16 (By Courier to London).—The appointment of Gen. Henri Honore Giraud as commander of the French armies in Africa makes it possible now to tell for the first time the full story of his escape from a German prison camp.

The escape was a feat of great ingenuity and endurance by the 63-year-old officer. And it was personally embarrassing to the Germans, for he had escaped from them also during World War I.

The story was told me by a friend who is working in Oran for the Allied cause. Incidentally the friend has a letter from Giraud, written in April, 1940, predicting the French defeat of June, 1940, at the hands of the Germans.

Made Rope of Scraps

Giraud was imprisoned, after that 1940 collapse, in a fortress with a wall 120 feet high. He determined to repeat his feat of the first World War and escape. Through underground channels, he established communications with Free French friends who began smuggling him civilian clothing. The hat they sent him arrived in a load of butter.

To descend the wall, he had to have a rope. So for six weeks he slowly made one of bits of rope, linen, sheets and other fabric on which he could place his hands. Guards searched his room regularly, so the general wore the rope, as he lengthened it, around his midriff under his clothes.

Giraud was a big, red faced, mustached man. When he was ready to escape he shaved off the mustache and to eliminate the resulting big white streak on his lip, made an ointment of brick-dust and grease. Upon finding the right shade of red, he rubbed the concoction on his face and went down the wall, hand over hand, at night.

Figuring that the Germans would search for him in the west toward France, he moved east for three days, passing as a German. Then he backtracked into Switzerland, actually reentering Germany to get to Metz, his old headquarters.

Always he was under the threat of recapture. Friends helped him to move south, village by village, until he crossed the demarcation line and reached unoccupied France. He presented himself to Marshal Henri Petain at Vichy.

Met Otto Abetz

The Germans learned of his presence there when he met Otto Abetz, Hitler's commissioner for France.

The doughty Giraud told Abetz that if the Petain government surrendered him to the Germans he probably would escape again, remarking, "You've had Giraud twice before and I escaped and I can do it again."

Giraud offered to surrender, in exchange for 500,000 French prisoners, if the Germans would furnish him a villa and allow his wife to accompany him.

The Germans decided, after a dramatic conference between Abetz and Giraud on the demarcation line that it would be a bad bargain. They left him, unhampered, in unoccupied France. Giraud went into retirement to work underground for the Allied cause.

When the general first escaped from Germany during the last war, he did it by posing as a side show barker. He had a wound in his side then, but bound it with a handkerchief soaked in wine.

Giraud is highly regarded in the Oran military department where he was a former commander.

Friends here say one of his greatest feats on that tour of duty or any other, was personally quelling a riot at Mostagne, east of Oran, without calling out the troops.

London, Nov. 21 (AP).—Resurgence of Allied seapower to the point where convoys in the near future will be carrying armament and supplies across the Pacific "to help bring deliverance of heroic China" was forecast today by A. V. Alexandre, first lord of the admiralty.

grimly pursuing British has set a record for backtracking in more than two years of war in North Africa.

The spectacular British drive has pushed him back more than 600 miles as the plane flies and 800 miles as the tank must travel from El Alamein, where a month ago he presented a mighty threat to Alexandria and Suez. That is more than double the distance he forced the British to withdraw last June.

The R. A. F., meanwhile, was striking heavily against Axis shipping in the central Mediterranean in token of what will come when Allied gains in North Africa are turned into bases for attacks upon enemy communications and upon the continent itself.

Cargo Ships Attacked

An 8000-ton merchant vessel was attacked off Cape Bon, in the Sicilian Straits, and another 2000-tonner suffered direct hits during an attack by the R. A. F. near Kuriet Island off the Tunisian coast. The latter was raked also by cannon and machine-gun fire. These were direct blows at efforts of the Axis to establish itself across the straits from Sicilly in Tunisia.

Malta-based British bombers attacked Catania, Augusta and Cosimo airdromes in Sicily, from where Axis troops have been taking off for the Tunisian front.

The triumphant British entry into Bengasi yesterday was the third in this war and represented the fifth time the Libyan port had changed hands between the opposing forces.

Gen. Sir Bernard L. Montgomery's men saw the awful results of the continued pounding of the port by British and American bombers before the Axis pulled out.

Moles, jetties and harbor installations were in shambles; great fires still were blazing from the Allied blows and from Rommel's own application of the torch.

Rommel Ready For Battle, Nazis Say

New York, Nov. 21 (AP).—The German radio said today that Marshal Rommel's Africa Corps had escaped entrapment by the British Eighth Army and that after receiving reinforcements of guns and tanks is "deployed in full fighting strength in thoroughly prepared and strongly fortified positions of considerable depth."

This broadcast, did not specify where Rommel had established his positions, but the reference to fortifications in depth might have indicated the El Agheila area.

The broadcasts, in sharp contrast to the German high command's official silence on Rommel's activities, boasted that his reinforcements included "tanks and guns of the most modern construction."

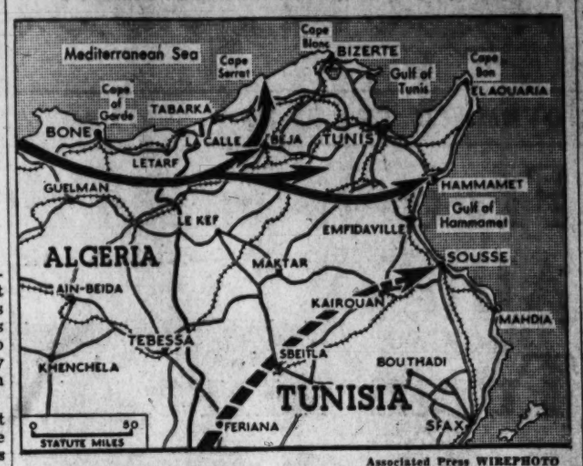
Nazis Isolated in Tunisia



Associated Press WIREPHOTO

ALLIED STRATEGY—General direction and extent of the Allied drive toward Nazi-held bases of Tunis and Bizerte is indicated by solid arrows. One Allied force is reported to have reached the area of Hammamet. A Fighting Free French column is reported moving up from the south (broken arrow) aiming to strike eastern Tunisian coast at Sousse under Lieut. Gen. K. A. N. Anderson.

[American and British paratroop battalions once more leaped into action and occupied a number of additional airdromes east of those they had already captured, the International News Service reported.]

A brief communique issued by the Allied headquarters said that advanced units in Tunisia "are maintaining contact with the enemy and it has been determined that 11 out of 30 German medium tanks were destroyed on November 18."

Though there had been no official confirmation today, it was presumed that the Axis continued to shoot a stream of reinforcements by air into Tunisia in hopes of building up a force that could withstand the Allies' onslaught. A week ago there were estimated to be 10,000 Axis troops in the Tunis-Bizerte area, but the number was believed to have been heavily increased, perhaps doubled.

British Subs Active

British submarines were active in fierce attacks on the Axis Mediterranean supply lines. One enemy destroyer and an emenmy tanker were sunk by torpedoes and another destroyer and a supply ship probably sunk. The sunken tanker was southbound in the Aegean, probably carrying sorely needed fuel to Axis forces. The destroyers were attacked right at Italy's doorstep, off Sicily.

From Cairo the British reported successful bomber attacks on Sicily, fountainhead of Axis aerial reinforcements to Tunisia.

As a British flag was run up over Bengasi, valuable Libyan port, for the third time in the war, an advance column of the British Eighth Army was reported to be harrying the fugitive Nazi Africa Corps in the neighborhood of Agedabia, within 70 or 80 miles of the El Agheila line where Marshal Erwin Rommel was expected to try to end his long retreat from Egypt by making a stand.

Coinicident with last night's strongly pro-Nazi address by Pierre Laval, France's chief of government, the British admiralty announced that the Mediterranean was "dangerous to shipping" at any point eastward of the Spanish-French frontier. The import was, apparently, that mines had been laid or other hazards established in the vicinity of the French Mediterranean coast to hamper shipping to Axis territory.

The Brazzaville radio repeated persistent reports that a Fighting French column was making the long march northward from Lake Chad in French Equatorial Africa to get in on the climactic fight in North Africa.

"North Africa—Allied force advance units in Tunisia are maintaining contact with the enemy and it has now been determined that 11 of the 30 German medium tanks were destroyed during the engagement on November 18. Enemy aircraft made a raid on Algiers yesterday evening."

U-Boat Activity Slacks Off in Mediterranean

By J. Wes Gallagher
Associated Press Staff Writer

Allied Headquarters in North Africa, Nov. 21.—During the last 48 hours there has been a "definite slackening" of Axis U-boat activity in the western Mediterranean, Admiral Sir Andrew Browne Cunningham, commander of the naval forces in the North African operations, declared today.

He said that the Royal Navy and the R. A. F. had given the German and Italian submarines a "good knock."

In his first press conference, he said he thought there had been about 50 Axis U-boats operating in the Mediterranean and in the Atlantic just off Gibraltar.

"In the approaching stage, the losses of merchant and Navy ships were considerably below what I expected and I don't think the losses of ships were out of proportion to the results obtained," he emphasized.

The Admiral said he regarded the estimate of two million tons of merchant shipping which would be saved if and when the Mediterrean route was reopened as "conservative."

If North Africa is cleared of Axis troops, the Mediterrean Sea would be opened to fast convoys which could get by the Sardinia-Sicily bottleneck, but some ships will have to continue around the Cape of Good Hope, he said.

The Royal Navy ships cooperating with troops entering Tunisia are being harassed by the Luftwaffe, but damages have been minor, Admiral Cunningham asserted.

36 De Gaullists Seized In Indo-China

Top Management Changes Scheduled By Standard Oil

New York, Nov. 21 (AP).—Retirement of Walter C. Teagle as chairman and election of Ralph W. Gallagher, now a director and vice president, to succeed him, are scheduled to be ratified Monday at a meeting of the board of directors of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey.

Other proposed changes in the top-ranking management, it was learned tonight, were mapped at a meeting of the executive committee yesterday.

They follow sharp criticism earlier this year by departments of the Government on Standard's practices relating to petroleum refining and other patents, and international oil agreements, especially those, before the war, with I. G. Farbenindustrie, the German dye trust.

Iraq Premier Lauds Roosevelt For Hitting Axis' 'Weakest Link'

By the Associated Press

The Prime Minister of Iraq, Nuries Sadi, has written President Roosevelt congratulating him on the Anglo-American landings in North Africa and asserting this "lightning blow to Axis pretenses in the Mediterranean now constitutes a threat to the weakest link in the Axis chain."

"The whole Mediterranean scene," the Prime Minister said in a letter dated November 18 and made public yesterday by the White House, "has been changed in a few days and all the friends of the United Nations, and particularly the Arab races of North Africa and the Near East, are full of rejoicing and grateful to you as the originator of this great action."

The White House described the Prime Minister as a devout Moslem and a distinguished Arab soldier-statesman, as well as an outstanding personage in the Islamic world. He has been Prime Minister of Iraq six times and was associated with Feisal, the late King of Iraq, as well as with Lawrence of Arabia, in the battles for Iraq freedom in the last World War.

The text of the letter follows:

"The news of the Anglo-American landings in Morocco and Algiers certainly came as a tremendous surprise to all of us in Iraq and in the great exultation which overwhelmed us we did not realize the magnitude of the operation involved. It is only now that the full details have been revealed that we can appreciate it to the full.

Difficulties Cited

"In 1917 when great American forces were landed in France they entered a friendly country; all port facilities were available to them and there was no land or air opposition. Far different was the case when you sent your expedition to North Africa.

"Great risk not only had to be faced in the long sea journey but from all the resources of the Axis powers in the air and on the sea. Nor was it certain what would be the attitude of the French forces in North Africa.

"Although it was known that French feeling was always in favor of the Allies, yet the possibility of active opposition by the professional elements in the French forces had to be taken into consideration.

"Mr. Churchill has told us that the plan originated in your brain, Mr. President. We are accustomed to expect great things from you, the originator of the New Deal and the man who converted the United States of America into one gigantic arsenal for democracy.

"But the planning that was necessary for the equipment and embarkation of this great force involving 500 transports and 350 escorting warships, and all this in absolute secrecy, was a magnificent achievement in itself, for which General Eisenhower and Admiral Cunningham and staff deserve the highest praise.

"Lightning Blow"

"This lightning blow to Axis prstenses in the Mediterranean now constitutes a threat to the weakest link in the Axis chain and, when Tunisia is occupied, Italy will have to be heavily reinforced by Germany if the death throes of the Axis are to be postponed.

"As a soldier I have been impressed with this stupendous undertaking, and I am still mazed at the daring of the conception, the perfection of the organization and the magnitude of the achievement.

"Your generals, working in close cooperation with their British colleagues, have proved their ability to make great and elaborate plans and to carry them into execution with the mechanical efficiency associated in our mind with your great country.

"The whole Mediterranean scene has been changed in a few days and all the friends of the United Nations and particularly the Arab races of North Africa and the Near East are full of rejoicing and grateful to you personally as the originator of this great action."

Paralysis, Nausea, Dizziness, 67 Below Zero Checked Pilot

By International News Service

London (Sunday), Nov. 22.—The air ministry announced today that a Spitfire fighter plane had reached a ceiling of 50,000 feet—nearly 10 miles—in fighting over Egypt, bringing to light the behind-the-front warfare between Allied and enemy scientists and mechanics, a warfare that has gradually forced aerial fighting into the stratosphere.

Germany started this mechanical competition by sending over a specially designed Junkers 86 on reconnaissance—capable of flying so high that the Allied fighters could not intercept.

But Allied mechanics got to work and daily boosted the ceiling of the British Spitfires until finally Flying Officer George W. Reynolds, 37, of Kenya, reached a height of more than 40,000 feet from the ground. At that stratospheric level he intercepted and shot down one of Germany's special high-flying Junkers.

Germany once again boosted the ceiling of their Junkers, and British mechanics went to work again. One day Reynolds pushed his little Spitfire 50,000 feet into the air and shot down his second Junkers in the stratosphere. He shot down the German despite a temperature of 67 degrees below zero, with his cockpit, joystick and instruments covered with ice, his arms paralyzed and almost fainting from nausea and dizziness.

After shooting down the huge German, Reynolds glided toward home. From this spot nearly 10 miles up he saw to his left the entire Aegean Sea, with Crete like a pebble in a puddle; Bengasi was to his right and the entire length of Palestine, the Egyptian Delta and the canal all the way to the fringes of the Red Sea, directly before him.

Reynolds received the Distinguished Flying Cross for his success in two stratospheric battles, the air ministry announced today.

Weygand Held By Nazi Police

By the Associated Press

New York, Nov. 21.—Gen. Maxime Weygand has been arrested as a hostage to replace the escaped Gen. Henri Giraud in Koenigstein Fortress at the direction of Joachim von Ribbentrop, German foreign minister, according to reliable information reaching New York today.

Ribbentrop, according to these advices, informed Marshal Petain in a letter that Giraud's departure from France to Africa meant he had broken a promise to Germany. Consequently, Germany could no longer accept the word of any French officer and would therefore take Weygand into custody to play safe.

Weygand letft Petain's house with his wife and son in Petain's car the night of November 12. The car was halted 5 miles from Vichy by a Gestapo car blocking the road.

Weygand's son returned to Petain and told the marshal what had happened.

Petain replied he had just been informed by a letter from Von Ribbentrop which arrived a few minutes after the Weygands had departed.

Weygand had first been arrested by French authorities for 24 hours but had made arrangements with Petain to return home under house arrest.

Weygand was cautioned five days before the African campaign that the Gestapo intended to arrest him, but placing his faith in Marshal Petain he had discounted the warning, said these advices.

Reds Beat Off Foe in Caucasus

By the Associated Press

Moscow (Sunday), Nov. 22.—German assaults intended to better the Nazi position in the Caucasus after the smashing Russian victory before Ordzhonikidze have been consistently hurled back by Russian units and at least two companies and a battalion of the enemy have been annihilated or dispersed, the Russians reported early today.

The Soviet midnight communique announced that in the Mozdok area (in the same general sector where the Germans were beaten) one Soviet unit in one day repelled three enemy attacks, "annihilating some two companies of enemy infantry."

On that cold Caucasus Front, the communique added, "Soviet artillery and mortar fire dispersed and partly annihilated about a battalion of German infantry."

Fighting continued in the sector southeast of Nalchik, where the Germans apparently took their worst beating in the action before Ordzhonikidze.

700 Nazis Wiped Out

One Red guards unit "wiped out more than 700 enemy officers and men" in that area, the communique said, and two enemy tanks were disabled and four burned out.

"Northeast of Tuapse on one sector our troops pressed the enemy back somewhat and captured several fortified positions," the communique said, reporting on the fighting in the Black Sea area of the western Caucasus. It added:

"In the factory district of Stalingrad our troops repelled attacks of small enemy groups. In other sectors our artillery engaged the enemy in duels. During the day 300 of the enemy troops were killed, and six guns and eight mortars were destroyed."

Russian reports yesterday said the German command appeared to be re-forming its shattered lines southeast of Nalchik in the Caucasus for a new blow at the Russians.

Reds Hold Initiative

New York, Nov. 21 (AP).—The Russian army held the initiative today in every Soviet sector mentioned in the German high command communique.

Although the Nazi war bulletin gave a picture of German success by saying that each Red Army thrust had been repelled, it admitted that the Germans were on the defensive in each engagement.

Heavy Blizzards Batter Alberta

Edmonton, Alberta, Nov. 21 (AP). The worst blizzard in the history of Edmonton struck Alberta on the wings of a bitter north wind last weekend, causing three deaths, tieing up city and country road traffic for two days and more and for a time threatening Edmonton with a milk famine.

Snow drifted more than 3 feet deep in the city's streets. Security reasons prevented disclosure of the snowstorm until today.

War Sidelights

War Work Gets Church, Also Pastor

Plainfield, N. J., Nov. 21.—The First Italian Presbyterian Church will be converted to war work and its congregation will have to seek a place of worship elsewhere, the Rev. Aurelio R. Mangione, pastor, announced today. The pastor himself went to work on November 9 as a clerk in a war plant.

The church building, which is a plain, oblong structure without a steeple will become an extension of a machine and tool company, just behind the church.

The pastor, who plans to continue preaching on Sundays, said an effort would be made to find another place of worship for the 100 members of the congregation. He has a son, Aurelio, jr., in the Army Air Forces.

Glider Troops Killed

Berlin (From German Broadcasts), Nov. 21 (AP).—One British bomber and two troop-filled gliders landed in southern Norway for purposes of sabotage and all the occupants were annihilated, the German high command said today.

"On the night of November 19-20 two British bombers, each towing a glider, flew over south Norway," the communique said. "One bomber and both gliders were forced to land. Sabotage troops on board were attacked and exterminated."

Dutch Town Fined

London, Nov. 21 (AP).—The Germans have imposed a $500,000 fine on the Netherlands town of Bloemendaal after the cutting of several Nazi cables, Aneta reported today.

Zero Attacks, Loses

Somewhere in New Guinea, Nov. 20 (Delayed).—From a reconnaissance flight, Capt. "Rabbit" Longacre of Stockton, Calif., brought back this report today:

"One Zero attacked—two passes—one Zero shot down."

12 Belgians to Die

London, Nov. 21 (AP).—A DNB broadcast from Berlin today said 10 Belgian hostages will be executed for the recent fatal shooting of the Belgian Nazi burgomaster of Charleroi unless those responsible are discovered by next Wednesday midnight.

Prisoner Swap

New York, Nov. 21 (AP).—Hungary and Rumania, nominally allies in the Hitler order, "have reached an understanding regarding the exchange of political prisoners," the German radio said today. It did not explain further, but said 21 Hungarian political prisoners would be surrendered at the border to Rumania.

Japs Seek to Compel Army Drill in Korea

Berlin (From German Broadcasts), Nov. 21 (AP).—The Japanese government has indorsed a bill providing for compulsory military service in Korea, Tokyo dispatches said today. Military service in Korea previously had been on a voluntary basis.

Nazi Winter Clothes Still Inadequate

By Henry C. Cassidy
Associated Press Staff Writer

Moscow, Nov. 21.—Some of the German army's winter equipment has appeared on the Eastern Front, and although it is better than last winter's when the Nazis were caught completely unprepared, it still is insufficient to cope with the rigors of the Russian climate, front line reports said today.

A dispatch to Red Star, army newspaper, said some German troops in the Leningrad sector had winter uniforms, but even though the bitterest cold and heaviest snow have not yet arrived many divisions thus far have received no winter outfits.

Winter clothes which were issued to one German division were said to consist of wicker wrappings for the feet, with artificial rubber soles, padded cotton jackets and cotton caps. The padded caps were given only to sentries, Red Star said, other troops being provided only with brown woolen cloths to wrap around their heads.

In the 540th German special battalion, the dispatch said, only troops on active scouting operations have been supplied with winter outfits.

The German winter uniforms are described as lined with white cloth so they can be turned inside out for camouflage in the snow.

Shivering German prisoners are quoted as saying emphatically that they are not warm in the Wehrmacht's winter uniforms.

Those Germans who have already been through the first winter campaign in Russia, the prisoners said, started a "self-collection" among the people of the towns they occupied, taking for themselves felt boots, fur-lined coats and fur hats with ear-laps.

Seven More Enemy Aliens Grabbed by FBI in New York

New York, Nov. 21.—Seven more enemy aliens—five Germans and two Italians—were seized Friday night by Federal Bureau of Investigation agents in raids in Manhattan, Brooklyn, the Bronx and Westchester, it was announced today by P. E. Foxworth, local FBI director. The arrests brought the total of enemy aliens picked up since Pearl Harbor to 2183.

One of the Germans, recipient of the Iron Cross during the World War, was said to have attempted, after Pearl Harbor, to mail a letter containing three photographs to Germany. The photographs had the Triborough Bridge as background. The bridge was one of the objectives of the eight Nazi saboteurs who landed in the United States by submarine last June.

2 Die in Plane Crash

San Diego, Calif., Nov. 21 (AP).—Ensign Thomas Edwin Rogers, 23, of Lubbock, Tex., and Raymond Walter Bunting, seaman second class, of Merchantville, N. J., died yesterday in the flaming crash of their plane after a midair collision with another Navy plane. The second craft landed safely at its base.

Yanks Make New Guadalcanal Gains

U. S. Land and Air Forces Move to Tighten On Island Following Great Naval Victory

By Marshall Andrews
Post Staff Writer

By land and air, United States forces have moved to tighten their hold on Guadalcanal Island, in sharp fighting following up the naval victory over the Japanese in the Solomons.

A Navy Department communique yesterday, describing three days of battle on the hilly strip of jungle in the South Pacific, said Army and Marine Corps forces last Wednesday threw their left flank across the Matanikau River and anchored it a mile from its western bank. This gain, the communique indicated, was made against opposition by Japanese patrols.

The same day, twin-motored Lockheed Lightning fighters of the Army shot down three Zeros in the vicinity of the Japanese base at Buin. These Zeros, the communique said, were in addition to those reported shot down Friday.

Continued aggressiveness of United States patrols Thursday succeeded in advancing their outpost line an unspecified distance into Japanese held territory. This fighting cost the enemy 35 killed, the Navy said, while United States forces suffered "few" casualties.

Yesterday United States aircraft flew 11 attack missions against Japanese installations on Guadalcanal with unspecified results. Ground forces continued to harass the enemy with incessant patrol actions.

The Navy, with characteristic conservatism, described the actions as "outpost" advances, "patrol activities" and skirmishes. Opinion here, however, was that fighting for the Guadalcanal position has been fierce and bitter and ceaseless. Henderson Field, once within range of Japanese field artillery, is now five miles from the outpost line and out of effective range of enemy field guns.

Jap Supply Lines Periled

With the United States now in control of the seas in the Solomons area, it was regarded as likely that severance of Japanese supply lines will place their troops on Guadalcanal in the position of United States forces on Bataan Peninsula, eventually to be conquered by starvation and disease. Ever since fighting on the island has been in progress the Japs there have been on the receiving end of air superiority which they used so mercilessly in the Philippines.

Yesterday's communique also reiterated the statement of Secretary of the Navy Knox Friday that Japanese ship losses in the night battle of November 14-15 did not duplicate those previously reported. Thus Japanese losses in the latest Solomons sea fight stand at 28 vessels sunk and 10 damaged.

Text of Communique

Text of yesterday's Navy communique No. 197 follows:

South Pacific: (All dates are east longitude.)

1. On November 18:

(a) Although enemy patrols were active, Army and Marine Corps forces advanced the western flank of our positions on Guadalcanal Island to the westward of Point Cruz.

(b) Army Lockheed "Lightning" fighters shot down three Zeros in the Buin area in addition to those previously reported in Navy Department Communique No. 196.

2. On November 19:

(a) United States patrol activity on Guadalcanal resulted in the advance of our outpost line. About 35 Japanese were killed. United States forces suffered few casualties.

3. On November 21:

(a) Eleven attack missions against enemy installations on Guadalcanal were carried out by our aircraft.

(b) Ground forces engaged in minor activities on Guadalcanal.

4. A recent dispatch from Vice Admiral Halsey, whom the President nominated yesterday for temporary promotion to the grade of admiral, has confirmed that the damage inflicted on the enemy, which was announced in Navy Department communique 195 is in addition to that reported in Navy Department communique No. 194.

R. A. F. Raids Burma Airport

New Delhi, India, Nov. 21 (AP).—R. A. F. bombers raided a Japanese airdrome at Magwe, Burma, about 250 miles north of Rangoon, last night and caused explosions on the runways and in the dispersal area, a British communique said today. None of the British planes was lost, despite presence of Jap night fighters.

U. S. Bombers Blast Jap Base

By the Associated Press

With American Forces in China, Nov. 20 (Delayed).—Fighter-escorted American medium bombers, striking down the Burma Road from Free China, unloaded three tons of explosives today on the Japanese army base at Lungling, starting several fires and inflicting heavy damage.

The mission was led by Lieut. Col. Herbert (Butch) Morgan, of Freedom, Pa., and was aimed chiefly at a large munitions dump and barracks.

After two runs over the target the bombers had caused fires which billowed smoke so dense that the crews were unable to assess full results. A big cache of munitions, however, was believed hit.

Trapped Japs Fight Furiously at Buna

Strength Grows

U. S. Victories Alter Balance Of Sea Power

By the Associated Press

Recent Pacific Fleet victories over the Japanese navy have churned up a wave of speculation as to how the balance of sea power has been altered between the Axis countries and the United Nations.

A year ago today it was possible to sit down with a set of charts and tables and see how many each nation had of the ships which, with their crews, make up the measurable element of sea power. The charts showed a great edge for America over Japan. The charts were wrong.

Unhappily, Japan won the pre-war battle of espionage so completely that almost everything Japan's enemies thought they knew about her navy was in some degree inaccurate. The timing and success of the enemy's attack on Pearl Harbor was perfect proof of the spy job the Japs had done.

Naval men in position to know say today that only the most general conclusions can be drawn about the present relative strengths and distribution of the American and Japanese navies and their adequacy for their jobs.

U. S. Strength Grows

Here are the conclusions:

Having repulsed the Japs in the Coral Sea, at Midway and in the Solomon Islands, the United States Navy is supreme in its own territory, roughly east of the great strategic line from the western Aleutian Islands through Midway to Samoa and south of the line from Samoa through Guadalcanal to Port Moresby, New Guinea.

At the start of the war the United States had a one-ocean navy built and a two-ocean navy on the way, and they shaped up in this manner:

Lost in the war to date—One battleship, four aircraft carriers, six cruisers, 22 destroyers, five submarines—total 38.

Four battleships have been launched since Pearl Harbor and many ships in other categories. But work has been stopped on plans for other battleships to make way for aircraft carriers, already badly needed in the Pacific.

Japanese Losses Heavy

The thrice badly defeated Japanese navy now operates almost entirely in home waters or waters close by. There it has not been challenged and is still supreme. It at once defends and depends on a highly entricate system of island bases from which spreads an umbrella of land-based aircraft to shield the surface ships. But the Japanese navy was so badly battered in the Coral Sea, at Midway and among the Solomons that it may even now be a crippled force incapable of recovering any effective striking power before this war ends.

Following is the Japanese naval picture based on what was reported here when the war started:

Lost to date—Two (possibly three) battleships, six aircraft carriers, 33 (possibly 34) cruisers, 48 destroyers, 28 submarines—total 117.

It is doubtful whether any of the categories for the Japanese are reasonably accurate except the list of ships they have lost and Navy men feel that their reports on destruction are conservative. It is thought here that the enemy actually had about 12 carriers, for several have been badly damaged in addition to the six sunk.

Allied Air Forces Back in Fray After Weather Checkmate

By the Associated Press

Allied Headquarters in Australia (Sunday), Nov. 22.—Fierce fighting raged for the second day at Buna, New Guinea northeast port between Gen. Douglas MacArthur's advancing troops and Japanese forces with their backs to the sea, the high command reported today.

The Allied air force reentered the struggle after being checkmated by bad weather yesterday.

Japanese naval forces, still willing to risk punishment despite this week's loss of a light cruiser and a destroyer which got under the bombsights of Allied planes, were declared to be maneuvering again off the coast.

Yesterday's communique told of the first appearance of Jap air units in force in some time, but today's reported the Allied fliers back in action, continuously bombing and strafing enemy positions and shooting down two enemy fighters.

The heavy fighting continued all along the short strip of coast between Gona and Buna. Americans were reported earlier to be only a mile from the Buna airport.

Allied bombers returned again last night to Kavieng, on New Ireland to the north of New Guinea, raiding the airdrome.

Crowd Attacks Jacques Doriot

London, Nov. 21 (AP).—Jacques Doriot, a leading French pro-Nazi, was attacked by a crowd armed with bludgeons recently and was taken to a hospital severely injured, the London Daily Express said today in a French frontier dispatch quoting Paris reports.

The dispatch said that Doriot and his bodyguard were set upon as they left a meeting of Doriot's National Popular Party, which has demanded that France declare war on the United States and Britain.

Ex-News Reporter and General Swim for It as Boat Is Sunk

By the Associated Press

New York, Nov. 21.—He wrote his mother gaily that he'd "be with the general and generals don't get hurt"—but Danny Herr, wounded, and his scrappy general had to swim half a mile to safety when Jap planes sank their trawler off the New Guinea coast, November 16.

The Daily News tonight revealed the story of Danny, their former reporter and "one of the nicest little guys who ever began a newspaper career as a copy boy on this newspaper."

Danny, they said, was a warrant officer and private secretary to the fire-eating general, name censored, who saved his life.

The two went overboard after the trawler was sunk, Danny with his legs injured, but his life belt keeping him afloat. The general made a brief stop on a dinghy, where he blazed away at the Jap planes with a rifle, then he went overboard again and struck out for shore, half a mile away.

At about this time, he spotted Danny, helpless to do much maneuvering, with the Jap planes overhead firing at him. He swam to Danny's assistance and the two, making frequent dives to duck bullets, made shore safely.

The News said Danny, 5 feet 5 inches and weighing not much more than 100 pounds, an "unlikely looking draftee," was inducted on January 15, 1941, and assigned to Fort Bragg, S. C., just a rookie. He became a corporal, then sergeant, then, at another camp he was made a master sergeant and secretary to the General.

After he reached Australia with the general, he got the rank of warrant officer, highest noncommissioned rank. It was from Australia he wrote his mother, Mrs. Minnie Herr, 61, of Huron, Ohio, about his sedate prospects with his general.

Mrs. Herr, who was in New York today, took the news of his wounds and his rescue bravely, and said:

"I knew he was only fooling about not getting hurt, but I haven't worlde and I won't now.

War's Main Issue Decided, Benes Tells Miners

London, Nov. 21 (AP).—President Eduard Benes of the Czech government-in-exile told a meeting of Durham miners today that "the main issue of the war has been decided."

"The Germans can stand another winter of war in Russia only with the greatest difficulty, if at all," Benes said. "With the grand armies of Russia still unbroken, it is now impossible for the German forces to swing back and make a furious attack in the west."

He warned, however, that the German war machine at present had "great strength" and said it should not be underestimated.

He pointed out that, although fuel products are rationed in the East, any industry that wants to burn oil to do business can get oil, and that no restrictions have been placed upon the oil needs of the armed forces in the area.

Oil now flows into the East to the extent of rail tank car capacity available, but no Government directive forces it to flow into channels that will guarantee "first things first," it was said.

As a result, when large amounts of oil are drawn away from the East for military uses, as was done recently in connection with the African offensive, Government officials find themselves without exact data on the effect of the withdrawals, it was said.

Crisis Admitted by Ickes

The existence of an East Coast oil supply crisis was admitted recently when Petroleum Coordinator Harold L. Ickes stated that that the East lacked 139,000 barrels of oil a day. On his recommendation, War Production Chief Donald Nelson directed Price Administrator Leon Henderson to make the necessary cuts in consumption to relieve the shortage.

Henderson promptly dropped the value of "A" gasoline coupons to 3 gallons, a measure that will save 20,000 barrels of oils a day.

Other cuts—directed at industrial consumers of fuel oil and commercial establishments with heating equipment that may be converted to coal and other fuels—are expected in the near future.

Lack of a planned program of oil distribution based on oil requirements makes it impossible to be sure that cuts in rationing will do the job, particularly with some consumers being entitled to virtually unlimited supplies, it was said.

Tank Cars Breaking Down

The situation is further complicated by the fact that the tank cars, which are the chief means use to bring oil to the East, are breaking down every day. The tank cars were designed to travel at an average speed of about 20 miles per hour, a few days a week. Actually, the cars have been forced to go 60 miles an hour constantly to keep up the needed flow of oil.

The oil situation is regarded as particularly dangerous because of the possibility that the armed forces may suddenly call upon the East to supply large additional amounts of fuel in connection with military operations. These amounts would have to be supplied—and in a hurry—whether it resulted in homes going without heat or not, it was said.

Meanwhile, Ickes announced that conversions to coal in the East, Middle West and South had saved approximately 100,000 barrels of oil a day—most of which occurred in the East.

Commenting on the significance of the fuel oil savings made to date through conversion, Deputy Petroleum Coordinator Ralph K. Davies said:

"In view of the fact that the Office of Petroleum Coordinator has been, and still is, working on a wholly voluntary basis, as far as industrial fuel oil conversions are concerned, the response to date is encouraging, but it is far from satisfactory.

"The Office of Petroleum Coordinator and the petroleum industry are determined to deliver all Allied oil needs when and where called upon. To accomplish this vast wartime job, much greater quantities of fuel oil must be saved this winter through conversions and conservation."

Lehman Named War Relief Administrator

as well, be supplied to the people of North Africa. The whole project was considered to have a powerful propaganda appeal for the French and the people of other nations which have been conquered and occupied by Nazi troops.

By contrast with the policy enunciated by the President, Nazi occupation has meant hunger—often starvation—for subject peoples. Most of them were drained of their food stocks early in the occupation. Heavy levies have since been made upon their crops to feed Germany and the German army.

Some thought that the promise of food would prove an inducement for the Italian people to help in facilitating an Allied invasion of that country. The Italians are war weary, resent the fact that their own food supplies have been seized by the Nazis and that their daily food ration is considerably less than that in Germany.

"Governor Lehman," the White House statement said, "will undertake the work of organizing American participation in the activities of the United Nations in furnishing relief and other assistance to the victims of war in areas reoccupied by the forces of the United Nations.

"This is a step in the President's program of mobilizing the available resources of this country in food, clothing, medical supplies and other necessities so that it may make an immediate and effective contribution to joint efforts of the United Nations in the field of relief and rehabilitation. Governor Lehman's appointment assures that this country will play its part in such efforts."

Will Play Dominant Role

Although the White House carefully phrased its announcement in a way that would not step on the toes of any Allied nations—by saying that Lehman would be in charge of American participation in relief distribution—the weight of American supplies may well give Lehman a dominant role in the entire United Nations program in this field.

Since the United States is the richest of the United Nations and has suffered least by the war, the devastated areas of the world will have to depend upon it almost exclusively for their supplies. This, in effect, if not by developing agreement with other Allied nations, would make Lehman relief administrator for the world.

His task apparently will parallel, but vastly exceed in its scope, the relief activities of Herbert Hoover at the close of the first World War.

Technically, Lehman will be associated with the State Department as director of foreign relief and rehabilitation operations.

Undersecretary of State Sumner Welles described the need of advance preparation for alleviating the suffering in Europe once "Hitler's brief day is done" in an address Tuesday before the New York Herald Tribune Forum.

GOV. HERBERT LEHMAN

Need for Speed Stressed

Welles said this country's machinery for relief and rehabilitation must be prepared "to operate without a moment's delay to alleviate the suffering and misery of millions of homeless and starving human beings if civilization is to be saved from years of social and moral collapse."

Lehman's resignation will take him out of the Governorship four weeks before Republicans assume control of President Roosevelt's home State for the first time in 20 years. Thomas E. Dewey, former Manhattan district attorney, was elected Governor November 3 and will be inaugurated January 1.

For the interim, Lehman will be succeeded automatically by 38-year-old Democratic Lieut. Governor Charles Poletti, Lehman protege and a former New York State Supreme Court justice. Poletti was defeated for reelection.

In appointing Lehman to his world-wide task, the President relies again on the man whom Mr. Roosevelt, while Governor of New York, termed his "good right arm." Lehman served as Lieutenant Governor four years under Mr. Roosevelt before succeeding him as Governor in 1933.

A partner in the nationally know banking firm of Lehman Bros. before entering public life, Lehman was reelected Governor three times. He defeated Dewey in 1938 to become the State's first four-year chief executive. Gubernatorial terms previously were for two years.

Long-Distance Phone Toll Cut Asked by FCC

The Government called for a second reduction yesterday in long-distance telephone charges.

American Telephone & Telegraph Co., the Nation's largest corporation, was ordered by the Federal Communications Commission to show why it should not substantially reduce toll rates and other charges in the face of commission figures indicating excess earnings of 47 to 62 million dollars this year. A hearing was fixed for December 16.

Declaring that the earnings which it held excessive were reflected heavily in both the cost of the war and living costs, Chairman James Lawrence Fly of the Commission said that "the Government must make every effort to keep down its bill for the war and to help the consumer keep down his expenses."

In addition to defending its charges, A. T. & T. was ordered to show why an immediate reduction in rates pending conclusion of the investigation should not be made.

Gifford Answers Commission

In answer to the commission's order a statement was issued almost immediately by Telephone Co. President Walter S. Gifford, saying that to him the rate reduction "would seem to make no sense."

"The important thing," he said, "is to win the war, and the commission's program will interfere with our service, which is vital to the war effort."

The FCC began an investigation of long-distance telephone tolls of the Bell System—by which A. T. & T.'s five-billion-dollar properties are commonly known—early last year, which resulted in rate reductions estimated to save about 14 million dollars a year. At that time charges were cut for most daytime calls of 144 to 1530 miles, rates were reduced for person-to-person calls longer than the initial three minutes and certain report charges were eliminated.

The text of Gifford's statement follows:

"I find it difficult to understand why the Federal Communications Commission has issued such an order contemplating a drastic rate reduction because under the circumstances it would seem to make no sense.

"The important thing is to win the war, and the commission's program will interfere with our service which is vital to the war effort.

"With our lines overloaded, we are having a hard time to handle the calls we have now and we can't get the materials to handle more—neither is there manpower to spare to handle more. At the urgent request of the Board of War Communications, we are spending millions of dollars in advertising to get the public to reduce its use of long distance, and now comes the commission seeking to reduce rates, which will do just the opposite. I fail to see how by any stretch of the imagination a reduction in long-distance rates will help win the war.

"The company, therefore, feels it must resist a reduction in spite of the fact that a rate case would require the time of many people who are urgently needed to carry on telephone service in these critical times.

"As to long-lines earnings, the commission's figures are misleading because they do not include all taxes. Our earnings as a whole, including long-distance business, are substantially lower than last year, and are short of the dividend which we have paid for the last 22 years."

the free movement of persons, property or information needed for the war effort.

Administration sources said it was apparent the committee draft would give the President and the war agencies virtually all the authority that would be needed to deal with any of the war mix-ups which Attorney General Biddle and other officials reported were now occurring.

Justice Department officials said that the subcommittee's bill was satisfactory to the attorney general.

Among the legal jams which officials testified present statutes have caused in the war program were these:

Canadian troops entering Alaska were tied up by the mass of documents prescribed by regulations and present laws.

American military pilots and Allied officials entering this country have been required to let customs officials inspect secret plans and confidential documents.

Civilian officials and military leaders from the United Nations, entering this country by plane, have been held up waiting for the prescribed customs inspection.

War plant officials have balked at letting representatives of our Allies into their plants for fear of violating the espionage laws.

Other laws, according to Biddle and other witnesses, have endangered Allied troop and ship movements, and interfered with repairs to American vessels in United Nations ports. Under the subcommittee plan the President would be free to suspend in whole or in part any laws which "curtail, delay, impede or otherwise interfere" with the war program.

Besides Cooper, the subcommittee members included Representatives Doughton of North Carolina, Ways and Means Committee chairman; Robertson of Virginia and Hill of Washington (Democrats), and Reed of New York, Woodruff of Michigan and Jenkins of Ohio (Republicans).

Antisabotourist Clubs also are being started throughout the country. So Joe, flushed by success, has written this poem:

A sabotourist is a guy
Who never lets a week go by
But what he doesn't try and try
To get some leave to go "bye-bye."

Desination? Doesn't know—
Just as long as he can go

The ticket sellers hate the cuss.

Why can't this gypsy just stay put?

population," he said.

(Civilian Government officials with responsibility for manpower are understood to fear that the military is playing "a shrewd game designed to grab control of manpower." The struggle recently has centered in the White House, where the two groups have attempted to get their position before the President. Meanwhile, Presidential advisers have been working on the draft of an executive order to reorganize the present labor control setup.)

Taft, who introduced a measure to establish a new manpower commission with broad powers, asserted that prompt action by Congress is needed to avoid a manpower "muddle."

Pepper said that he planned to continue hearings on a bill to centralize control over all civilian agencies in a vast Office of War Mobilization, with several industrialists expected to testify next week.

One of the big results of McNutt's West Coast announcement is expected to be a coordinated effort to end labor piracy in the whole area, where chaotic hiring conditions have been the rule, rather than the exception. In the area, aircraft, shipbuilding, lumbering, Government construction and metal mining have all competed for a dwindling labor supply.

Whether the program will succeed is expected to depend to a large degree on the cooperation received from the military, which pays the bills for most of the war activity in the area. However, the Army has been acting independently to handle manpower in the area through its highly organized Office of Civilian Personnel.

Major provisions of the plan which McNutt approved include arrangements for continuous accumulation of specific data in all war plants on labor supply problems, a system of central clearance for all hiring throughout the region, and principles for the development of procedures for labor utilization and the control of labor migration.

"By means of information gathered in each industrial area," McNutt said, "the war manpower area committees, working closely with the regional office, will be able to facilitate orderly withdrawal of employes by the Selective Service, as well as the recruitment and training of workers for essential activities. It is believed that their operation will greatly reduce, if not eliminate labor piracy, and aid in the reduction of migration, absenteeism and labor turnover."

(One of the main problems in manpower control has been coordination of activities of Selective Service and War Manpower Commission. WMC has suggested that Selective Service be placed under its wing and the military is reported to have countered with a proposal that WMC be integrated into Selective Service.)

Meanwhile, the Department of Agriculture announced an experimental plan to recruit, train and place year-round farm workers to help meet an agricultural labor shortage expected to reach 1,500,000 next year, according to present trends.

Under the program, 300 farmers now tilling unproductive lands in Kentucky and Wisconsin will be placed in productive farming. The Kentucky farmers will be trained for three weeks at Ohio State University. The Wisconsin farmers will be placed immediately, since they all have much-needed experience in dairy farming.

Transportation expenses will be paid by the Department of Agriculture.

Arlington Bridge Reflector Sought

A request for the placing of a reflector at the intersection of Mount Vernon Memorial Highway and the Arlington Memorial Bridge was sent to the Public Roads Administration by the Keystone Automobile Club yesterday.

The letter, the C.I.B said, is the result of local motorists complaining that they have experienced difficulty in reaching the National Airport from the west end of the bridge. The letter specifically requests an electric or reflector-button sign indicating the proper route to the airport.

ANNOUNCING the first commercial production of chemurgic rubber
Agripol

New Synthetic Rubber . . . Joint Product of Science and Agriculture

NOT RUMOR—not predictions—not hopes—but actual commercial production of synthetic rubber—that's the report RCI makes to you and every American.

Ever since our source of natural rubber was seized by a treacherous enemy it has been confidently predicted that American scientific skill and manufacturing ingenuity would circumvent this crucial obstacle.

Today, those predictions are coming true.

AGRIPOL, a chemurgic synthetic rubber, represents an important milestone in chemistry's program to make the American farm the source of basic raw materials for American industry. The raw materials for Agripol come from American farms and, when processed in the RCI manner, result in a highly satisfactory substitute for many rubber applications of a mechanical nature, but at present Agripol is not recommended for automobile tires.

Reichhold Chemicals, because of its quarter century of leadership in producing synthetic resins, which involve complex chemistry, was among the first to undertake making chemurgic rubber a practical manufacturing accomplishment . . . to carry the notable work of the laboratory* to its ultimate goal of volume production.

The speed and success of this endeavor are now evident . . . Agripol is already available commercially, offering its contribution to the solution of our Nation's wartime rubber problem.

New Congress Due to Wield Economy Ax

By Edward Jamieson
Washington Bureau of Chicago Sun

The Seventy-eighth Congress, which convenes in January is likely to be the most economy-minded Congress since the days of Calvin Coolidge.

This does not mean that the new Congress will not be a heavy spender. There will be no curtailment in war expenditures and if necessary they will be increased. But governmental expenditures for nonmilitary purposes during the coming year are expected to be cut to the lowest total since the predepression days.

Plans are already under way to slash drastically appropriations and personnel for the nonwar Federal agencies. Some of the old-line and New Deal agencies may be abolished completely, or at least shelved for the duration.

It is too early to compute accurately how far Federal expenditures during the current fiscal year will be below those of last year, but a conservative estimate would place the total at approximately 850 million dollars.

Cannon's Estimate

Recently Chairman Cannon (Democrat) of Missouri of the House Appropriations Committee estimated that the savings under last year on nonmilitary spending would aggregate 931 million dollars. He computed the total expenditures of this type, exclusive of interest on fixed indebtedness, at $5,125,000,000 in the last fiscal year, compared to an estimated $4,194,000,000 this year.

Additional appropriations may be needed for some of the departments whose work is allied to the war effort but it is considered doubtful that these added funds would total much more than 75 to 100 million dollars at most.

Economy-minded members of Congress believe this figure can be exceeded next year. Their goal is another reduction of a billion dollars or more, and they hope it will be more.

A saving of one billion dollars in Federal expenditures appears to be negligible when single war appropriation bills totaling as high as 27 billion dollars are submitted to Congress and approved without a murmur. But there is a considerable difference between expenditures to carry on the war and appropriations to keep peacetime agencies in operation.

Uses of Tax Revenue

The Federal tax revenue, insofar as possible, is first used to pay the regular operating costs of the Government. Much of the war cost, even though taxes have been greatly boosted, is being financed through loans. Thus any savings obtainable in regular operating costs can be applied to the cost of the war to hold down future tax increases.

Many also have felt that Government operating costs have got out of hand, even for peacetime. Now, with private incomes reaching record peaks, they believe the opportunity has come to pare Government costs to a minimum. Once they are reduced, it is felt, they can be held in line when peace returns.

The paring operation will begin in about two weeks when the House Appropriations Committee starts to work on budget estimates for the various departments and agencies.

Representative Albert Thomas (Democrat) of Texas estimates that appropriations for many departments and agencies will be reduced 20 per cent or more, while others may get no funds at all.

Pepper Wars on Filibustering, Anti-Poll-Tax Knockout Near

The Senate yesterday wrapped all but the final oratorical trimmings around the anti-poll tax bill which it plans to toss in the legislative wastebasket tomorrow, as Senator Pepper served notice that he will seek to abolish all future opportunities for filibustering from the rule book.

The two-hour debate, over a measure whose sponsors and opponents agreed had been as good as killed the day before, was a shadow-boxing preliminary to a final knockout already fixed for delivery at 1 p. m. tomorrow. At that time, under a gentleman's agreement, the Senate will vote on applying cloture, the formal gag-rule, to consideration of the poll tax.

The bill's sponsors have conceded that only a miracle could give them the two-thirds vote necessary to apply cloture, and without it they have agreed to drop the bill.

Terming the anti-poll tax filibuster a "denial of democracy to our own colleagues," Senator Pepper said he would move tomorrow to write these two changes into the Senate rules.

A provision empowering a simple majority of members on hand to force any measure to a final vote after 10 days of debate.

A stricter cloture rule which would apply to motions and points of order as well as to an actual bill.

The wartime filibuster showed, said Pepper, how a handful of men in the Senate could dictate the terms of peace when war ends. "We have seen the frustration of democracy," he shouted. "The time to permit filibustering has passed in this country."

Pepper later conceded that his antifilibuster plan could easily meet a filibuster in its own right, but he added that "there has never been a time when this matter could be more clearly before the people."

From the other side, Senator Hill (Democrat) of Alabama declared that in fighting to defeat the poll tax repeal bill, "we were fighting to preserve the sovereignty and integrity of all the States." Senators Smith of South Carolina and Andrews of Florida, both Democrats, also charged the bill was a threat to States rights.

Against the all but vanished chance that sponsors of the legislation woud seek to continue the fight, opponents introduced eight controversial amendments, including one to lower the voting age to 18 and another to prohibit payment of subsidies by the Federal Government.

Besides the debate, the Senate gave unanimous consent to the request of Senator McKellar (Democrat) of Tennessee, supported by Senators Bunker (Democrat) of Nevada, and Maybank (Democrat) of South Carolina, to erase from the record any reference to their "arrests" of a week ago to muster a quorum. Majority Leader Barkley pointed out that the record showed only the times they entered the chamber.

Montville, N. J., Nov. 21 (AP).—A 61-year-old companion to Mrs. Mamie Trimble, 84, jumped from a second-floor window early today and rescued the elderly woman from a fire that destroyed the home.

Mrs. Trimble, awakened in her first-floor room by cracking, called upstairs to Mrs. Alva Degraw.

Flames cut off the stairway so Mrs. Degraw jumped 15 feet to the yard, reentered the building and led Mrs. Trimble to safety.

Mrs. Degraw suffered a fractured nose, a fractured thumb and head injuries from the jump. She was taken to a Morristown hospital.

War Cost Hits 60 Billions; Doubles '17-'18

By International News Service

World War II to date has cost the United States Government approximately 60 billion dollars, or twice the total direct cost of World War I, fiscal officials disclosed last night.

This huge sum represents money actually paid out up to the present time. The total is increasing at the rate of about $5,500,000,000 a month, and the rate may reach seven billion dollars a month next year.

The record outlays are giving rise to a growing demand in Congress for closer scrutiny of war expenditures in order to eliminate all nonessential outgo.

Representative Woodrum (Democrat) of West Virginia, a member of the House Appropriations committee, declared that, when new appropriation bills come before the House next year, a vigorous effort will be made to see that Government agencies cut out "waste and inefficiency."

U. S. Manpower Waste Hit

The major source of complaint is the number of Government employes, said by Senator Byrd (Democrat) of Virginia, to total three million. Byrd, accusing Government agencies of "wasting manpower," argues that they could well afford to reduce the number of their employes by one-third.

"There has been too great an expansion of personnel by Government agencies during the present war," Woodrum declared. "In many agencies a lot of people are standing around and falling over each other."

He said he hoped Congress would take more time with new appropriation measures and would examine appropriation requests more carefully in order to force cuts in spending where possible.

The present session of Congress, which began last January 3, has appropriated a total of $147,000,000,000 to date for both war and nonwar purposes. About $140,000,000,000 has gone to place this country on a war footing.

30 Billions Spent Last War

Thus far defense and war appropriations directly connected with World War II have aggregated $225,000,000,000.

Aside from the $60,000,000,000 already paid out, $165,000,000,000 is in various stages of being spent. Contracts either have been let or arrangements are being made to enter into contracts.

Total United States Government direct outlays resulting from World War I were around 30 billion dollars, officials recalled.

Expenditures in the present war include Lend-Lease aid. The World War I figure, however, does not include the 12 billion dollars of war debts, part of which was for rehabilitation purposes after the war.

Because of subsequent defaults on these debts, the greater portion of the total should be added to the cost of World War I. The defaulted debts, plus veterans' benefits, etc., would increase the overall cost of World War I to about 45 billion dollars.

The Government debt, which soared to 26 billion dollars during World War I, has skyrocketed to 99 billion dollars under the stimulus of the unprecedented outlays of World War II. It may reach 140 billion dollars by next July 1, the end of the present fiscal year, according to official estimates.

Whereabouts of McKees' Baby Remains Divorce Suit Mystery

Associated Press WIREPHOTO

MISSING 2-YEAR-OLD—Terry McKee, 2, shown with his mother, Mrs. Evelyn McKee, disappeared from her home in Los Angeles a few hours after his custody was awarded his father, Mark T. McKee. The decision was the outcome of a bitter court battle. Mrs. McKee denies knowledge of the child's whereabouts

Los Angeles, Nov. 21 (AP).—The baby for which Mark T. McKee, white-haired steamship executive, and his blonde wife, Evelyn, fought bitterly in court was still denied to either of them today.

McKee won formal custody of the child, 2-year-old Terry Alexander, along with a divorce from Mrs. McKee yesterday. But when he went to her home to enforce the court's order, his wife said Terry had vanished.

Mrs. McKee, returned to Judge Thurmond Clarke's court last night, denied she knew her son's whereabouts but expressed the belief that he was with her stepdaughter, Cynthia, 20, who was granted temporary custody during the trial of the divorce suit.

McKee Issues Public Appeal

Cynthia, one of McKee's 11 children by a former marriage, sided with her stepmother in the trial.

McKee issued a public appeal to his daughter, saying he was concerned not only for the baby but for Cynthia's future happiness and assuring her "of a wholeheated welcome from all of us."

The judge, meanwhile, amended his court order to provide that the girl and the baby could be taken in custody anywhere in California. The original order empowered authorities to act only if they were found in Mrs. McKee's home.

McKee told Judge Clarke he was threatened with a rifle in the hands of Gerald Berry, 17, a son of Mrs. McKee by a former marriage, when they approached the house yesterday afternoon—a few hours after the divorce was granted.

Mrs. McKee, however, charged that McKee broke down the door to force entrance.

Returning later with a deputy sheriff and a writ of habeas corpus, McKee was informed of Terry's disappearance.

The divorce battle, which attorneys said in their arguments was fought chiefly to gain Terry, was marked by charges of extramarital intimacies on both sides. McKee was given the child's custody nine months of the year, Mrs. McKee during the summer.

Wartime Curbs To Show Up In New Homes

By the Associated Press

Home isn't going to be the same if it's built under wartime restrictions.

Housing Administrator John B. Blandford, jr., indicated yesterday that the single-family detached unit, which has comprised about 80 per cent of the war housing put up so far by private builders, is going to become pretty scarce.

Furthermore, he said, a reduction of 15 to 25 per cent in the floor area of the average private dwelling could be expected to result from restrictions imposed recently by the War Production Board.

The restrictions will not apply to the 75,000 private units now under construction or to another 75,000 for which preference ratings have been issued in advance of the start of construction—provided no extension of time is needed to use the ratings in buying materials.

They will apply to the 120,000 remaining units of the private housing quota for which priorities have not yet been granted and these are the ones that are likely to be different, although Blandford said they could be sound and comfortable.

Construction of single-family dwellings will be allowed "only where the essential utilities are contiguous to the lot, except where other types of dwelling units clearly would require the use of a greater quantity of critical materials.

Exterior wall construction will have to be "laid-up masonry or other lumber substitute, except in areas where masonry materials or labor are not obtainable," Blandford said, adding that the new standards would reduce the quantity of lumber that has been used in the average private dwelling by about one-third.

In addition, designs must be based on the use of "the lowest grades of lumber practical for the purpose and all available species which can serve the purpose must be specified," the administrator said.

Because of limitations on plumbing installations, kitchens and bathrooms will have to be located so that "a minimum of critical materials will be required."

Vacuum Cleaners Released

In the process of sending civilians to the cleaners, the Government relented just a little yesterday and authorized all retailers and wholesalers to sell to the public any vacuum cleaners they have on hand. Stocks were frozen on October 24 but it has since been found that the military has no need for machines now in the hands of retailers and wholesalers, the War Production Board stated.

Dairy Products Next

Most immediate new rationing expected would control meat, which has been very short in many areas. Consumers will receive a top basic weekly ration of 2½ pounds a person, starting in mid-January, when OPA issues its new "universal" ration book.

Once the "universal" book is issued, institution of new rationing programs will become less of a task, and consumers may expect other programs to be added as shortages develop.

Dairy products are also scheduled for tighter control with some areas already facing shortages of fluid milk. If bulk milk is diverted in considerable quantities from other dairy products, including butter, some additional rationing will be necessary.

An OPA official said the butter situation was "in pretty bad shape," but that no immediate rationing was required.

Nation-wide rationing of gasoline is scheduled to go into effect on December 1, with motorists outside of the East receiving a basic "A" ration of four gallons a coupon.

The December 1 deadline also applies to turning in excess tires throughout the entire country. Any motorist who retains more than five tires after that date will be denied his right to gasoline.

Starting today in the East, and December 1 in the rest of the country, motorists will be required to write the license number of their automobile and the name of their State across the back of each gasoline coupon before presenting it for gasoline.

Attempts to stave off Nation-wide gasoline rationing by a bloc of Midwestern Congressmen yesterday ran into the determined opposition of Rubber Director William M. Jeffers, who told a congressional committee that he had no intention of postponing rationing.

However, Jeffers was able to convince the Congressmen that he meant no reflection on them when he stated recently that opposition to Nation-wide rationing was financed "by people who should know better."

Rationing of coffee is scheduled to start at 12:01 a. m. November 29, when coupon No. 27 in the sugar ration books of persons over 15 years of age become good for a pound of coffee. The pound will be expected to stretch until January 3, when another pound may be purchased with stamp No. 28.

The Office of War Information interjected a note of encouragement by pointing out that the average European cannot find coffee at any price.

Institutional users are scheduled to register at their local ration boards to receive their allotments of coffee tomorrow, Tuesday and Wednesday. At that time they will receive instructions on how to keep the necessary records on food consumption next month.

In explaining the new requirement, Paul M. O'Leary, deputy OPA administrator in charge of rationing said:

"Regardless of which food commodities are rationed or not rationed, the OPA needs the fullest possible information on the use of available supplies. Boarding houses, restaurants and hotels are among the largest users of all foods, and in many instances it is impossible to procure from them more than the most general kind of information."

Hitler's Railroad Crisis

Reader's Digest reports neglect of railroads may be vital factor in breakdown of German war machine

"The German economic high command has recently made an unprecedented decision—allocation of raw materials, factory space, and manpower for the repair and construction of locomotives is to have priority rating as high as tanks, airplanes and U-boats."

From "Hitler's Vulnerable Spot—Railroads," in November Reader's Digest, cabled from London by Allan A. Michie.

Hitler gambled on superhighways and a motorized Germany to provide most of the mass land transportation, military and civilian, necessary to fight this war.

Those superhighways are now largely deserted because his far-flung army swallows all rubber, oil and gasoline.

He starved Germany's railroads. He banked on a short blitzkrieg war and stolen equipment to keep them running.

He guessed wrong on that one, too.

"The (German) railroads," says Reader's Digest, "are forced to struggle with the Nation's entire traffic, which increased 63% in 1940, 76% in 1941, and is now even higher."

"Transportation men in Sweden . . . are astonished at the dilapidated condition of cars arriving by train ferry from Denmark . . ."

"Neutral estimates agree that . . . one-third of Germany's locomotives are laid up for repairs."

"The German Reich Minister of Economics recently admitted that transport had become the central problem of the whole German war effort."

Now Let's Look At Our Own Railroad Picture

Pearl Harbor found America's railroads, in spite of lean years, ready to go at the drop of the hat.

They had worked out a plan of unified war operation. They had the men, the know-how, and the equipment to put that plan into instant effect.

For a full year of war—with the cooperation of government agencies and civilian shippers and travelers—our railroads have handled successfully the greatest traffic load in all history.

So far, so good.

But What of the Future?

Such a record has its price.

That price is immense strain on all physical plant, especially in the ceaseless pounding of trackage, cars and locomotives.

We, too, shall face a transport crisis—unless materials are available for repairs, maintenance and replacements to match this growing wear and tear.

Supreme Test Still to Come

No man knows what our traffic peak will be, or when it will come.

We do know the load increases daily.

We do know there is a limit to the performance that can be squeezed out of existing equipment.

Keep 'Em Rollin'—or Else

No nation that does not possess efficient mass transportation can hope to win a modern war. In America that mass transportation job is squarely up to her railroads. If they fail, we lose.

To meet this tremendous responsibility, we ask for every possible consideration in the allocation of materials for vitally essential repairs, maintenance and new equipment.

Did you know that a good radio should NOT have tone?

A radio should have no tone of its own—if you are to hear the program as it is played. It is this "noiseless" quality that set a Stromberg-Carlson above all other radios.

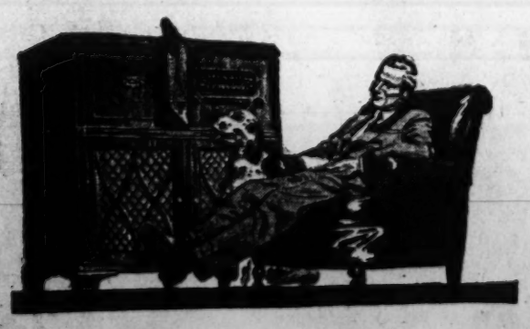
For a radio that does not impose unwanted sounds on great music . . . hear Model 925-PF* (below), a radio-phonograph combination. You'll agree, "There is nothing finer than a Stromberg-Carlson!"



MODEL 925-PF*, a combination FM-AM radio-phonograph for $300. Also a range of other models in authentic period designs. Easy payment terms are available.

WLB Acts to Speed Pay-Control Plans

10 Regional Boards to Be Set Up to Help Decentralize Work; 39 Key Industries Named

Urged to action by representatives of organized labor who have expressed the fear that the country's wage-control machinery might bog down in a mass of governmental red tape, the War Labor Board yesterday took decisive steps to decentralize its operations and provide the basis for the setting up of ten "little War Labor Boards" in the field.

WLB formally announced the names of 10 regional directors, along with lists of labor, management, and public representatives who will sit on advisory boards in each of the country's 10 regions.

Four representatives of each of the three groups were listed in each region. The advisory boards will contain a rotating membership drawn from the lists and will contain two representatives of labor, two of management, and two of the public.

To Control Each Area

Although these boards now only are authorized to advise the regional directors, it is understood that WLB plans to extend their authority in easy stages until the boards will actually become "little War Labor Boards" with absolute power over wage controls in each area, subject only to reviewing and policy-determining actions from the "big board" in Washington.

At the same time, WLB named 29 industries where regional directors will be allowed to apply the board's 15 per cent "Little Steel" formula. In all other industries requests to apply the wage yardstick will have to be referred to Washington for the present, WLB said.

The list of 29 represents primarily war industries, industries in which the board has had past experience settling disputes and industries which have already received wage increases approximating 15 per cent. Significant omissions in addition to most nonwar jobs include railroading, which is handled by the Railway Mediation Board; shipbuilding, which is operating under the WPB shipyard stabilization agreement; building construction, which is handled by a Department of Labor Stabilization Board, and coal mining, which is now operating under a Nation-wide contract with the United Mine Workers.

Eight Million Affected

The wage problems of approximately eight million, or one-fourth of approximately 33 million workers in the country not engaged in agricultural or governmental employment were thus placed in the hands of the regional directors with the list expected to be rapidly enlarged as WLB secures additional experience with other industries.

The industry, labor and public representatives were generally prominent citizens in the area who could be expected to be familiar with local problems.

District wage problems are subject to the jurisdiction of Region Three, with headquarters in Philadelphia. Sylvester Garrett, former principal mediation officer of WLB, has been named acting regional director, with an office at 573 Broad Street, Philadelphia. Local wage problems should be submitted in the first instance, however, to the Wage-Hour Division regional office in Baltimore.

A list of the other regional directors, all named on an "acting basis," and their present jobs follow:

Saul Wallen, WLB senior mediation officer (Boston); Theodore W. Kheel, WLB assistant executive secretary (New York); M. T. Van Hecke, dean of North Carolina University Law School (Atlanta); Lewis M. Gill, assistant executive secretary of WLB (Cleveland); Robert K. Burns, WLB principal mediation officer (Chicago); Thomas Fair Neblett, principal mediation officer, WLB (Kansas City, Mo.); Floyd McGowan, Bituminous Coal Commission trial examiner (Dallas); Charles A. Graham, NLRB regional director (Denver); Robert Littler, attorney (San Francisco).

Advisory board members for Region Three (including the District) are as follows:

Representing the public: Alexander H. Frey, professor of law, University of Pennsylvania; Robert Johnson, president of Temple University, both of Philadelphia; Dr. Thomas E. Larkin, Anthracite Conciliation Board umpire, Hazelton, Pa.; J. J. Sherer, Jr., D. D., pastor First English Evangelic Lutheran Church, Richmond, Va.

Representing labor: Frank Burch, secretary-treasurer Philadelphia Central Labor Union (A. F. of L.); Thomas Gallagher, Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers (C. I. O.), Camden, N. J.; John J. Lorden, Philadelphia A. F. of L. organizer; James Thomas, district director of United Steel Workers of America (C. I. O.), Homestead, Pa.

The list of 29 industries is as follows: Abrasives, aircraft, automobiles, chemicals and allied products, cotton manufactures, dyeing and finishing textiles, footwear, iron and steel, and their products, leather, logging, machinery, meat products, metal mining, nonferrous metals and their products, nonmetallic mining and quarrying, petroleum, coal and natural gas products, petroleum and natural gas production, planing mills, professional and scientific instruments, photographic apparatus and optical goods, railroad equipment, rayon manufactures, refractories products, rubber products, sawmills, street and suburban railways and buses, surgical, medical and dental instruments, equipment and supplies, tobacco products, woolen and worsted manufactures, work clothing.

Negro Labor One Cause of C.I.O. Dispute

By the Associated Press

Baltimore, Nov. 21.—A representative of the International Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America (C. I. O.) asserted today that objections to the employment of Negro workers was one of the causes of an intraunion dispute which resulted in the dispatching of Coast Guard Reserves to the Bethlehem-Fairfield shipyards to keep order.

Lucien Koch, port director of the union, said one of the causes of the factional dispute was the "resentment of one group" of union men to the employment of Negroes at the yard.

"The union's position in the matter is clear, as all available forces of labor must be used at the present time," he added.

Koch declined to say what other causes of the dispute were, but added that national union leaders were expected to come to Baltimore "in a day or so" to "iron out the matter."

He also said, "We don't expect the differences to be serious." Sam Fox, publicity director of the Maritime Workers' Union, Local 43, said that five men were expelled from the union last week on charges among which was the incitement to race hatred, directed primarily against Negroes and Jews.

J. M. Willis, vice president and general manager of the shipyards, in an earlier statement, said Commander Carl H. Abel, captain of the port of Baltimore, had "thought it advisable" to send coast guardsmen to the yards because of "the possibility of unpleasant action taking place between different factions within the local union."

Fox said the five men expelled from the union had friends at the yards who had been trying to provoke stoppages. He said the union had condemned them and asked the company to dismiss them from their jobs.

How Pontiac Dealers share in the war effort

America's war production is dependent, to a large extent, upon the ability of America's war workers to get to and from factories. This means that America must keep rolling, to keep producing.

To keep America rolling is our primary function today as Pontiac dealers. We and our factory-trained mechanics are continuing at our post of duty to fulfill this vital and important mission.

All of our skill, aided by the most modern and efficient equipment and tools, is dedicated to the job of keeping America's war workers rolling to factories, mines and mills, and——in addition, with the complete cooperation of the Pontiac factory, owners are being fully protected in the matter of genuine replacement parts to further help them to keep rolling.

Duck-Hunting Accident Kills F. C. Ferber

Francis C. Ferber, 49, vice president of Southern Wholesalers, Inc., was accidentally killed yesterday while duck hunting near his summer home at Sherwood Forest, Md., on the Severn River near Annapolis.

According to meager details reaching Washington, Ferber was killed when his shotgun, which was standing against a duck blind, discharged. With him on the trip was his wife, Mrs. Hazel Ferber.

A resident of the Westchester Apartments, the huntsman had been connected with the Southern Wholesalers, 1519 L Street Northwest, since 1925. He was a certified public accountant, a member of the Washington Board of Trade and of several Masonic organizations.

He was a native of Washington and is survived by his wife, one sister, Mrs. W. Edward Beck, and a niece, Miss Marian Beck, all of this city. Funeral services will be held Tuesday at 10 a. m. at Deal's Funeral Home, 4812 Georgia Avenue Northwest. Burial will be in Cedar Hill Cemetery.

Burglar Hangs Himself in Police Station

Recaptured late Friday after escaping police on Armistice Day, Arthur L. Richardson, 31, Negro, thrice convicted burglar of no fixed address, hanged himself in a cell at the Thirteenth Precinct Station yesterday.

He looped one leg of his trousers around his neck and tied the other leg to the bars about 2 p. m. He was found a few minutes later by Privates J. E. Young and J. M. Wilson when they took another prisoner into the cellblock.

Released conditionally from Lorton Reformatory in August, Richardson was caught in the act of looting a grocery store at 1700 Euclid Street Northwest, about 4 a. m. Armistice Day. A citizen, Robert Hoffmaster, 1658 Euclid Street Northwest, held him at bay with a shotgun and turned him over to police.

On the way to the Precinct Station the prisoner escaped from Private Cullen M. Camper, the wagon guard.

Determined to recapture the man, Camper discovered his identity after searching Rogue's Gallery pictures and learned where he worked.

Late Friday, Harry Lohman, retired police captain now employed at the Shoreham Hotel, took the man into custody. Richardson, a former employe of the hotel, had applied for back salary.

Police reported that the man had threatened to kill himself after his arrest "because it's all over with me now, I guess."

Records showed he served a year in 1932 for burglary, two years in 1936 for the same offense and was convicted again in 1939. He was released conditionally in the latter case in August.

Rickenbacker Well, In Good Spirits

He explained that just the dislike for the taste of this raw meat kept him from eating much of it, and not the fear that it might make him sick.

"All the others ate them when we could catch them," Rickenbacker said. "And they did not get sick. As a matter of fact there were no disturbed stomachs after the first two or three days. The reason was simple enough. No one had anything in his stomach."

With Rickenbacker on the little raft were Col. Hans C. Adamson, of Washington, D. C., and Bartek, of Freehold, N. J.

With them had been Sergt. Alexander Kaczmarczyk of Torrington, Conn., who died on the raft and was buried at sea.

The Navy announced that Capt. William Cherry, jr., of Abilene, Tex., was rescued from a raft, and that three others of the 52-year-old Rickenbacker's party were found on a small island.

The three on the island were Lieut. James C. Whitaker of Burlingame, Calif.; Lieut. John J. De Angelis, Nesquehoning, Pa., and Staff Sergt. James Reynolds, Fort Jones, Calif.

Their ill-fated plane was taking Rickenbacker on an inspection tour of the South Pacific war front, a trip the ace was making for Secretary of War Stimson.

Jokes About Fish

In speaking of the raw fish and sea gull diet, Captain Cherry admonished Rickenbacker not to say that no one had anything in his stomach.

"You know I ate that fish eye," Cherry said, laughing.

The survivors laughed, also, at this remark, and Cherry explained:

"We were going to use this fish eye for bait when somebody dropped our last fishhook overboard. So I ate the eye, probably before the others thought of splitting it seven ways."

Rickenbacker declared he never doubted for one moment that he and his companions would be rescued.

"I do have my own religion," he said. "I hold to the Golden Rule and I believe most firmly that if a man just follows what he truly knows and feels in his heart, then he cannot go wrong, and is possessed of religion enough to get by in any man's land."

Ace Speaks of Close Shaves With Death

By Sergt. Richard C. Seither
U. S. Marine Corps
(Distributed by International News Service)

Somewhere in the South Pacific, Nov. 14 (Delayed).—Capt. Edward V. (Eddie) Rickenbacker — who should know—stretched his bandaged hands, rubbed his swelled eyes which gave the appearance of a prizefighter just out of a 10-rounder, and spoke categorically today on "the nearness-of-death feeling," with which he is well acquainted.

It was Saturday morning and the famed ace was "feeling great" after responding better in one day's recuperation on Friday the thirteenth than any of the seven survivors of his plane crash.

"Yessir, I can speak with authority on that subject," Rickenbacker said. "This makes the fourth time in my stormy life I have been close to death. I know I came within hearing distance of the old fellow this trip because his approach is always the same, and unmistakable.

"One hears beautiful, soft music and everything is extremely pleasant, just as Heaven should be," he said.

Some one asked: "Did you think you were in heaven?"

Rickenbacker answered: "I guess I was presumptuous."

He listed his four escapes from death at, once, when he was injured in a racing automobile; once when the doctor "yanked out my tonsils, and walked out leaving me bleeding to death; that plane crackup in Atlanta, and this rescue."

Flash Bulbs Attract Bartek

Exploding flash bulbs of a marine photographer attracted the attention of Pvt. John Bartek, one of the survivors, who was lying in the next room.

"Can I come in and have my picture taken with you?" Bartek called to Rickenbacker. "I want my Mom to see me with you."

Rickenbacker pondered the condition of the youth, who was probably the weakest survivor, as he had been drinking salt water for two days before being rescued.

Bartek shut up.

"I've been getting mad like that all my life," Rickenbacker commented. "I expect I found I had to do it to keep the guys in line, but that ability never came in handier than on this trip.

"We all bickered badly, and sometimes, if I hadn't been tough and shouted them down, I'm sure several of them would have cracked up."

Scrap Drive To Get 50 Tons Of Trolley Rail

More than 50 tons of steel streetcar rails on the old Chevy Chase Lake line will be recovered and contributed to the District salvage pile, Edward Merrill, president of the Capital Transit Co., informed scrap drive officials yesterday.

Merrill said the Maryland State Roads Commission would aid in securing sufficient roadway material necessary to repair the streets. Cost of the project, estimated at $3000, will be borne by the transit company.

Some 125 cars, totaling about 2000 pounds of vitally necessary scrap metal, have been offered to the Salvage Committee's jalopy-junking round-up program, the committee announced.

A conference of scrap-drive officials and editors of all junior high school newspapers will be held in the offices of the District Salvage Committee Tuesday to discuss the school participation.

M. Stuart McGee, assistant executive secretary of the committee, has been assigned to coordinate and complete establishment of the 66 area salvage units under the District Salvage Corps plan.

Members of the committee and representatives of local newspapers recently made an inspection tour of the Vulcan detinning plant at Sewaren, N. J., and found that with a highest possible quota of one ton of tin cans per 1000 persons per month, Washington might be counted on to supply 800 tons every month.

The cans must be thoroughly washed, with tops and bottoms and labels removed and then completely flattened out if the best use is to be made of freight space and time.

Commercial establishments are urgently requested to register with the D. C. Salvage Committee, Republic 8488, for collection services.

Buses Serving Potomac Park Area Will Be Rerouted

Completion of the Virginia Avenue underpass between Twenty-first and Twenty-fifth Streets Northwest and the opening of Twenty-third Street from N Street north to Massachusetts Avenue has meant the rerouting of five bus lines serving the Potomac Park area from various sections of the city.

The affected lines are the Glover Park, Massachusetts Avenue, Connecticut Avenue, Sixteenth Street and Petworth routes, all of which serve the Federal section in the vicinity of Eighteenth Street and Constitution Avenue. Only the immediate approach to the area will be affected by the changes, however.

While official approval of the line changes will not be given by the joint board, composed of Public Utilities Commission and District officials, until Monday, the rerouting went into actual effect yesterday on order of the Metropolitan Police. The board is expected to follow on the indicated changes.

The changes will route the Glover Park, Massachusetts Avenue and Connecticut Avenue buses from Twentieth Street and New Hampshire Avenue to Twenty-third Street in the morning, where they will proceed south to Virginia Avenue and thence to Constitution. In the evening they will return via Virginia Avenue and Twenty-second Street, which has been designated as a one-way street, north.

The Sixteenth Street and Petworth buses will be routed south in the morning off Sixteenth Street via Florida Avenue to Twenty-third Street and back east to Constitution by Virginia Avenue. They will go north in the evening by way of Twenty-second Street and Florida Avenue to Sixteenth Street.

Time on all schedules is expected to be improved, F. A. Sager, PUC engineer, said yesterday.

Speeders Face Loss of Gas Ration Cards

Possible revocation of gasoline rations as a penalty for exceeding the 35-mile-an-hour speed limit became effective last midnight in the District after a "black list" of more than 200 Washington motorists convicted of speeding since October 1 had been turned over to rationing authorities.

The "black list" does not automatically bar the convicted parties from gasoline rations, but the fact that they have been guilty of speeding will be weighed against them when they make applications for supplemental gas or additional tires, OPA authorities said, and their cases will be investigated more thoroughly than those of applicants with clear records.

Motorists arrested since last night, however, and from here on out, for speeding, will be subject to virtually automatic loss of their gasoline rations as well as denial of tire applications if it develops that their name already is on the "black list" running from October 1 to November 22.

The "black list" was compiled by the Board of Revocation and Restoration, whose secretary, Edward R. Deane, secured the names as motorists appeared in court to answer speeding violations and passed them along to District OPA Administrator Whitney Leary.

Leary's office, in turn, will send the names to all local rationing boards for their guidance in weighing future applications—both for gas and tires.

Convictions of District motorists in areas other than Washington also will be reported to local rationing authorities, Leary said, by officials of the various jurisdictions in which the violations occur.

D. C. Man Dies Of Traffic Injuries

was a collision between an Army ambulance and a farmer's truck at Fourteenth and K Streets Northwest, at 5 a. m.

Bound for Walter Reed Hospital with an obstetrical patient, Mrs. Alice Doyne, 20, of Alexandria, Va., the ambulance was traveling north on Fourteenth Street and struck an eastbound truck operated by Elden S. Phillips, 37, of Harrisonburg, Va.

The truck was overturned, strewing its load of produce, eggs and chickens about the intersection and pinning Russell A. Phillips, 47, of Broadway, Va., in the cab.

He was cut out of the wreckage by firemen and taken to Emergency Hospital. Doctors said he suffered a fractured skull and a crushed chest. Little hope was held for his recovery.

Mrs. Doyne, wife of Sergt. William Doyne, 24, of Fort Belvoir, Va., was removed from the scene to Emergency Hospital and later was transferred to Walter Reed. Her baby was born dead shortly after noon.

Her husband, with her in the ambulance, received cuts and bruises and several broken teeth.

Pvt. Frank Armentano, 27, of Fort Belvoir, driver of the ambulance, escaped unhurt. He was taken into custody by police pending the outcome of Phillips' injuries. Corp. Lloyd Palmer, 23, of Fort Belvoir, received minor cuts.

Five Women Injured

Five women were injured, none of them seriously in a collision between a Capital Transit Co. bus and an automobile at Sixteenth and D Streets Northeast at 5:30 p. m. They were:

Ethel Dailey, 31, of 233 Fourteenth Street Southeast, a passenger in the car, which was operated by Ephraim Harrison, Negro of 1824 Seventh Street Northwest; Mae Burnett, 45, 126 Eighteenth Street Southeast; Ruth Smith, 22, 310 Twenty-ninth Street Northeast; Margaret Vogelson, 15, 1735 B Street Southeast, and Sue Baisey, 58, 3533 Warder Street Northwest.

The last four named were passengers on the bus and all, except Miss Baisey, who was admitted to Casualty Hospital with internal and spinal injuries, were removed to their homes where private physicians treated them for minor injuries. The bus was operated by Berthold J. Bertges, 5415 Illinois Avenue Northwest.

4-Year-Old Boy Struck

Another District traffic accident reported yesterday occurred when 4-year-old Edward Donald Smith, Negro, of 306 K Street Southeast, was struck by an automobile as he crossed the street in front of his home at 2 p. m. The driver of the auto, James Hunter, Negro, 36, of 1109 Seventh Street Southeast, removed the lad to Providence Hospital where he was treated for scalp abrasions and a leg injury and then transferred to Gallinger Hospital.

Even nearby areas failed to escape the recent plague of traffic accidents. The Herndon Fire Department ambulance last night brought to Georgetown Hospital the victim of an accident near Carsons Road in Fairfax County. He was George Updyke, 48, of that section, who sustained a possible fracture of the hip and back.

The Police Department yesterday called upon clergymen, citizens associations, clubs and other groups for circulation of a "drive and walk safely" plea.

Inspector Miller sent to all precinct commanders a digest of causes of District traffic deaths this year and asked that it be sent to the various organizations "to be imparted to audiences."

71 Pedestrian Deaths.

He pointed out that 71 of this year's deaths have been pedestrians and the majority of them were killed crossing between intersections, by running across streets and by stepping carelessly from street car loading zones.

Fatalities attributed to motorists, he said, were due to excessive speed, failing to yield the right of way to vehicles and pedestrians and drunken driving.

Miller placed much of the blame for the increased death toll to street cars and buses. (Thirty-one persons out of 97 this year have been killed by these vehicles.)

"Nine operators of streetcars figuring in fatal accidents had no automobile drivers' permits," he said. "I think they should all be licensed."

Statistics showed that traffic accidents have decreased a little more than 25 per cent despite the increase in fatalities. Streetcars and buses, however, figured in 10 per cent of the 9852 accidents, though these vehicles comprise less than 2 per cent of Washington's total.

FRIENDLY RIVALS—Members of Washington's Yale and Harvard Clubs yesterday met to listen to the broadcast of the annual Harvard-Yale football classic. Left to right—R. H. Hallett, vice president of the Harvard Club, Class of 1904; Charles A. Barnard, Harvard '02, who is telling of his experience as guard on the team when Harvard beat Yale, 22-0; Ensign William V. Platt, U. S. N., Yale '39, who was captain of the team and played center; Len Burdett, Yale '12, who was catcher on the baseball team, and Charles G. Cooper, president of the Yale Club

In business suit and old mellowing tweeds, without benefit of brisk fall air, the crush of the Bowl or any cheering they didn't choose to raise themselves, several hundred Yales and Harvards held joint luncheon at the Willard Hotel yesterday to listen to the big game.

An annual event, held when the two teams meet, the program featured restrained cheering, a grand meal, pitchers of beer and some dignified singling out of old football stars among them, such as Charles A. Barnard, Harvard guard, 1901-1902. Yale was beaten, 22 to 0, he recalled. Now Barnard is an attorney for the Federal Public Housing Authority.

New faces that came with all the crush into Washington were present and there was a large sprinkling of commissioned uniforms. Among the new group was Ensign William V. Platt, United States Naval Reserve, Yale '39 and captain of the football team.

The sluice-gates of enthusiasm aren't opened at these annual football sessions of the two clubs. The alumni has, it appears, been out of college long enough to take even football meditatively, at least with aplomb and slight cheering.

R. H. Hallett, now with the Maritime Commission, vice president of the Harvard Club and graduate in 1904, led the Harvard group at the luncheon; Charles G. Cooper, Yale '26, now district manager of the Cooper-Bessemer Company and president of the Yale Club, headed the Yales.

Leary Sets Inspection Dates For D. C. Autos and Tires

Inspection dates for District automobiles during December and January have been set by Whitney Leary, local OPA director.

Inspection of a car and tires is necessary before the owner is eligible for gasoline and tire recapping or new tires, known as mileage rationing.

The inspection dates have been arranged according to the tag number of the vehicle. From three to four days will be allowed for the inspection of each group.

Leary urged that each owner study the chart and determine the days his group will be inspected, for any owner not reporting in a three or four-day period will risk being unable to have his car inspected. This will make him ineligible for mileage rationing.

The inspections will include passenger cars, buses, motorcycles, trucks, trailers and commercial vehicles.

A list of the official inspection stations is now being compiled and will be made public at an early date.

G.W.U. to Confer Degree on Ecuador President Tuesday

George Washington University will hold a special convocation Tuesday at 4 p. m. in the U. S. Chamber of Commerce Building to confer upon Dr. Carlos Albert Arroyo Del Rio, President of Ecuador, the honorary doctor of laws degree, it was announced yesterday.

President Arroyo Del Rio, who is in this country to inspect the war production effort, is scheduled to visit President Roosevelt tomorrow. His trip will include visits to nearby Virginia and Maryland, Detroit, Buffalo and New York.

Drivers Urged To Deliver Tires to Office

District motorists with more than five tires are asked to deliver the extras to the railway express office, instead of waiting to have them collected by the express people.

The request was made by both express and District OPA officials, because of the jam the express company has found itself in. However the express company will collect those not turned in eventually.

As the result of the recent tire registration, it was revealed there are 7106 surplus tires in the possession of District motorists, which will have to be turned into the express company.

Certificates of tire inspection will be required of all motorists. Those with surplus tires will be denied the right to secure these certificates until they have shown they disposed of the tires through the proper channels.

Elks to Initiate 100

A class of 100 candidates will be initiated into the Alexandria Lodge of Elks, No. 758, Monday night at the Elks' building on Prince Street.

The record class will be known as the James R. Nicholson fight-for-freedom class, in honor of the man who served as grand exalted ruler of the B. P. O. E. in 1915-1916 and who now is chairman of the Elks war commission.

A buffet turkey supper will be served after the meeting.

Ration of Oil May Ban Group Use of Schools

Civilian defense and other non-school activities, now requiring the use of 15 public school buildings here, will probably have to seek other meeting spots if the ration board decides to cut down the amount of oil asked to heat those buildings, The Post learned yesterday.

Jere Crane, first assistant superintendent of schools in charge of building maintenance, expects an answer to requests for oil tomorrow in the form of ration coupon books. He told a Post reporter that although he did not anticipate the nationally proposed 25 per cent cut in the amount of oil asked, he did expect some cut.

Any decrease in the number of gallons of oil allowed the schools will immediately affect activities utilizing school buildings after hours. He pointed out that appeals for use of school building rooms were increasing rapidly.

Average temperature in all school buildings during school hours is around 70 degrees and is dropped to below 60 degrees after hours. The heating units have to be refired to provide 70 degrees of heat if the school is to be used during the evening or holidays. It is this practice that will suffer from any cut in oil requests.

Crane said it would be impossible to operate the schools at the necessary temperature with a slash in the amount of oil used last year. At the same time, he said, if toward the end of any period it is found that there is not enough fuel to keep the schools open for teaching purposes, a supplementary allotment will be asked. Crane said he had been urging all school building custodians to economize, when possible, on fuel.

The schools slated for rationing are: Ketcham, Kromes, Syphax, Jefferson, Briggs - Montgomery, Chamberlain, Terrell, Margaret Washington, Rudolph, Dennison, Banneker, Bunker Hill, Coolidge, Western and Woodrow Wilson.

The remaining schools are coal-heated and also used by various organizations for meetings. Consequently, any projects that might be left without an oil-heated room or rooms will either have to seek quarters outside schools or compete for time and space with projects now installed in coal-heated schools.

Rush for Pupils' Work Permits Burdens Franklin School Staff

"STEP BY STEP"—Waiting to be interviewed on their applications for work permits, youths wait on the steps in the busy Franklin School Building

Issuance of work permits to school-age children has reached such sizable proportions that the usual staff assigned to this work at the Franklin School no longer is able to cope with it, The Post learned yesterday.

As result, persons whose normal tasks are far removed from that of passing out permits are being compelled to double in brass and take up posts in that department, particularly on days when physical examinations are given to applicants.

Since January 1, 1942, more than 15,000 permits—vacation, regular and street trade permits—have been issued to children between 14 and 18 years of age. More than 1800 were issued last month, and as many more in September.

In September of last year the number of permits issued was 848; in the same month the year before, the number was 412.

Repeated requests for additional office help, school officials say, have gone unfulfilled and as a consequence attendance officers, file clerks, education consultants and others connected with the public school system have shoved less pressing matters into the background to lend a hand in the work permit department.

The unprecedented demand for the permits is attributed, of course, to the war-manpower shortage, expanding Government agencies.

Plaintiff in Nylon Hose Case, Awarded 85c, Seeks New Trial

Miss Patricia Hall, 1433 Belmont Street Northwest, plaintiff in Washington's first nylon hose suit on grounds of being overcharged, plans to enter a motion for new trial in Small Claims Court, before Judge Hobart Newman tomorrow.

Judge Newman gave his decision in the case on Friday in which he held Miss Hall was entitled to the 85 cents she claimed she was overcharged when she bought a pair of hose from The Stella Ladies Shop, 1926 Pennsylvania Avenue Northwest.

She had asked the penalty of $50 allowed a customer who is overcharged under OPA regulations. The judge said his decision was made in view of the testimony that Mrs. Stella Chaltis, proprietor of the shop, had just lost her father and had not seen the revised price schedule until after the sale was made.

Yesterday OPA lawyers filed a petition with the court to be permitted to intervene on behalf of Miss Hall as "friends of the court."

As there is now no motion for new trial or notice of appeal before the court, the judge said there was no case before the court in which the OPA could intervene at present.

Under District law, he said, a motion for new trial must be made within two days after the decision is made, which would make today the last day for filing the motion.

It may be possible to have the motion dated back, however, if it is filed Monday.

OPA officials, in a formal release, said, "Under District of Columbia procedure, if Judge Newman rejects the petition (to reverse his decision), OPA's next step would be an appeal to the Municipal Court of Appeals."

17-Year-Old Boy Charged With Ax Murder of Mother

By the Associated Press

York, Pa., Nov. 21—William Jackson, jr., 17, was charged tonight with the murder of his mother, Mrs. Mary Ellen Jackson, 41-year-old mother of nine children, York County District Attorney W. Burg Anstine announced.

Mrs. Jackson's multilated body, the head, arms and legs severed with an ax, was found early today near her home in rural Warrington Township, 15 miles north of here.

Anstine said the boy admitted he killed his mother and dismembered her body following an argument Friday morning.

Anstine told this version of the tragedy:

Friday morning the father, William Jackson, sr., 55, left for work and five of the nine children went to school. The oldest boy, Vincent, 22, left to visit a neighbor, leaving William and two other children, aged 3 and 4, with the mother.

Mrs. Jackson, hulling walnuts in the backyard, asked William to help her with the family washing. He refused, went back to the house, smoked a cigarette, and then returned with a butcher knife in his belt.

Coming up behind her, he pushed her to the ground and, when she cried for help, stabbed her repeatedly in the abdomen and back. She died as a result of these wounds. Anstine said:

Body Burned, Dismembered

The boy then dragged his mother's body about 10 feet away, brought gasoline from the house and set fire to the body. In doing this he suffered chest burns and also burned his shirt, which he hid in a nearby field.

Anstine said the boy then dragged the body about 20 feet further and cut off the head, arms and legs with an ax. He covered them with a burlap bag and hid them behind a stump.

William tied a rope to the torso. Dragged it to a summer house adjoining the farmhouse and hid it, together with the woman's burned clothing, beside a fireplace. He left there the knife used in the murder.

Leaving the two younger children in the house, William hitchhiked to work, where he slept on a truck last night.

About 8 o'clock this morning another brother, George, 15, saw bloodstains near the house and followed them into the summer house, where he found the torso. He and his father then found the rest of the body in the field. Identification was established by Mrs. Jacksons wedding ring.

Later police apprehended William along a road between York and his home. Assistant District Attorney Buchen quoted the boy as saying:

"I was on my way back to bury the body."

Anstine quoted the boy as saying that he had thought of killing his mother for some time because he resented her orders.

Compromise Settles Board, Room Quarrel

A compromise between the boarders and management of a rooming house in what was once Henderson's Castle, famous Sixteenth Street mansion, yesterday ended a dispute over an attempt at increase in board and room rates.

The complicated agreement reached by attorneys representing each side results in the present tenants paying the same amount for board and room as formerly, but with the assurance they will not be asked for any further increases for six months.

65 Boarders Only

The agreement provides that there shall not be more than 65 boarders lodged in the huge house; that the present high standard in food be maintained and that no increase shall be asked for six months.

Mrs. Allison and Detterer had asked for permission to boost the room rent and ask more money for food.

It was shown at the hearing that the room rent already had been raised $3 a month without proper authority and that the boarders were entitled to a rebate of at least $33, or possibly $50 each, under rent control law.

However, it also was shown that there had been a substantial cost to the management in the food served.

The tenants agreed to pay $3 a month more for food and the management agreed to reduce the room rent by $3 a month.

Same as Now

In other words, the tenants are to pay the same as now, and may not be asked for more for six months. The management will be permitted to increase either food or rent charges at the end of six months if they are able to show increased costs to them.

After the signatures of boarders and management are affixed to the agreement it will be given to Leonard Hayes examiner for the rent administration, for approval.

Henderson Castle was built by Senator John B. Henderson of Missouri in 1888 from the plan of a castle he had seen on the Rhine. There, in the years following, he and his wife ruled Washington society. Mrs. Henderson died in 1931 after being in seclusion for a few years. The house was placed on the market by the estate in 1934.

A 21-year-old Washington boy has been killed in action while fighting with the Marines in the Solomons Islands, it was learned yesterday.

The Navy Department notice to his family did not give the date of his death. Besides his parents, he is survived by one sister, Mrs. James F. Hammond, 103 Kennedy Street Northwest.

Pocketbooks Must Go on Wartime, Mrs. Morgenthau Says

Our pocket books like our clocks must go on war time, Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, jr., declared yesterday at a luncheon of the women's division, District of Columbia War Saving Committee at the Y. W. C. A., Seventeenth and K Streets Northwest, held as a prelude to "Women at War Week," starting today and running through November 29.

Speaking before more than 150 women, Mrs. Morgenthau, chief of Special Activities Unit, United States War Savings Staff, said that during this week 43 million women will be "attacking the enemy with one of their chosen weapons—the war bond."

A window at 1212 F Street Northwest will be opened tomorrow as a war bond station and as a special feature of Women at War Week, it was announced yesterday. The station will be in service during store hours throughout the week.

Mrs. Morgenthau said the week including Thanksgiving had been selected intentionally. She felt that the American people "wanted to give thanks in a very special and tangible way, for their blessing—the blessing of freedom and the freedom to fight for freedom."

AT THE "Y"—Taking a leading part in the war bond drive at a luncheon yesterday in the Y. M. C. A. were (from left) Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, jr., wife of the Secretary of the Treasury; Mrs. John J. O'Connor, chairman of the women's division of the District War Savings Committee, and Mrs. Henry A. Wallace, wife of the Vice President

Stressing the new responsibilities of the woman of 1942, she said:

"Whatever she is doing, in field or factory, in home or school, in arsenal or hospital, there is always one more thing that she can do, that she must do—buy war bonds."

Describing the present stage of the war as the new "attack" phase, she warned that this is not the final phase.

"When a ship is in action," she said, "it fires hundreds of shells in a few short minutes. Every time a four-motored bomber takes off it has to have more than 2000 gallons of gasoline in a tank.

"That's something we want to remember the next time we are tempted to feel sorry for ourselves because we can't get more than three gallons of gas.

"Each victory in Northern Africa may mean a cut in the standard of living in Washington. But which do we want:

"Victory on the fighting front, or luxury on the home front?"

Mrs. Morgenthau said investing "extra money" for stamps and bonds was not enough. "We have as yet no conception of cutting consumption everywhere down to rock bottom."

Mrs. Henry A. Wallace, wife of the Vice President, and Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone, wife of the Chief Justice of the United States, sat at the speakers' table.

Mrs. John Jay O'Connor, chairman of the women's division of the District War Savings Committee, presided.

People of England Not Apprised of Facts, Writer Says

By the Associated Press

London, Nov. 21.—The Sunday Dispatch late tonight published prominently on Page 1 a report from Don Iddon, it's New York correspondent, declaring that the United States censorship of outgoing messages is preventing the British people from getting a complete picture of America at war.

"There have been many important developments here which have appeared in the American press and have been read by millions of people which we have not been allowed to send to England," Iddon wrote. "There have been criticisms of the war effort and directions made publi here in the press and over the radio which you have not heard because the American censorship has stopped us from sending them."

Price's Declaration

He asserted he was taking advantage of the declaration by Byron Price, director of censorship, at the recent British correspondents dinner that "you can say what you like about our censorship, that won't be censored."

Iddon added he was making a "protest against certain aspects of American censorship" on behalf of himself and other British correspondents "and I hope the American authorities will permit it to be transmitted to England without deletions."

He declared that in some instances an erroneous impression had been given in Britain regarding the output of certain war factories, and efforts of British correspondents to correct the impression had failed because the messages were stopped.

The newspaper prefaced the story with an editorial note that "this important statement printed exactly as received from the Sunday Dispatch-New York Reporter, brings into the open a problem which no British newspaper has yet tackled although it is well known to all of them."

No Comment Here

(In Washington, the Office of Censorship had no comment.)

Last Thursday, Iddon complained that, after he had filed a story Monday on the prepared text of a speech to be delivered in New York by Wendell Willkie, the censors advised him they would clear a reference to Admiral Jean Darlan only if Iddon interpreted the remark as referring to the Vichy policy of the American Government as it existed before the North African operations. They would not clear it, Iddon said he was told, if it was interpreted as criticism of the present dealings with Darlan.

In delivering the speech, Willkie dropped the reference to Darlan and later said he had done so at the request of Secretary of War Stimson.

In response to a query Friday a spokesman for the Office of Censorship said news dispatches on the Willkie speech had not been censored.

Thanksgiving Local Turkey Supply Ample

If you want to sink your teeth in a drumstick from a Maryland or Virginia turkey, come Thanksgiving, you will have no trouble buying same.

If, however, you have a craving for the bird from the Western plains or the warm South, you are going to find it difficult to get one, local wholesalers said yesterday.

But most turkey connoisseurs insist there is excellent eating to be found on the turkey raised with the smell of Chesapeake Bay water in its nostrils and believe that the average turkey eater will not be able to detect any difference, once the bird has been cooked to the traditional golden brown.

Contrary Early Reports

That was the situation as of last night, in contrast to published surveys last week, which stated: "Smaller turkey supply likely in the Capital area," and, on the same day, "Turkeys enough for D. C. Thanksgiving."

Prices will range from 41 cents a pound to 53¾ cents a pound, depending on the quality of the fowl.

Quick frozen and eviscerated birds will sell for as high as 81 cents a pound.

No Extra Holiday Trains

Washington retail stores will be closed on Thursday, in the downtown area, it was announced yesterday.

On another Thanksgiving front, the ban on the addition of extra passenger trains to handle the anticipated holiday travel led the Pennsylvania and Baltimore & Ohio Railroads to announce that there is every likelihood there will be standing room only on the regular trains.

Joseph B. Eastman, director of the Office of Defense Transportation, urged that the public cooperate and forego that annual family reunion on Thanksgiving.

The situation was emphasized by the announcement by the Pennsylvania Railroad that the 125 extra trains used last year would not be available this year.

Mason to Talk With Wickard On Milk Dearth

In a move to avert the already acute shortage of milk in the District area, D. C. Commissioner Guy Mason will confer with Agriculture Secretary Claude Wickard Monday to ascertain just what steps may be taken to assure an adequate supply for this section.

Commissioner Mason insisted yesterday that there would be no reduction in specifications for milk received in the District, no matter how far afield the city's milkshed is carried.

He said that the manpower shortage had not affected the corps of District milk inspectors and that they were prepared to go as far as Ohio and West Virginia to inspect herds and dairy conditions for milk coming into this area.

"We won't have any justice of peace and political camp follower health agents inspecting the milk coming into this region," he declared emphatically. "We'll have District inspectors covering the entire Washington milk shed, no matter how far it must extend."

The Commissioner said there already is a 7000 gallon a day shortage in the District, despite the 100-mile additional radius the D. C. milkshed has acquired since the shortage became apparent. The military forces in the vicinity and manpower shortages on dairy farms are held responsible.

Commissioner Mason said he could not tell just what his conference with Secretary Wickard would accomplish, but said he hoped something definite would result.

Newspaper Editors Society to Meet Here Jan. 22-23

The American Society of Newspaper editors will meet here January 22-23 at the invitation of Elmer Davis, director of the Office of War Information, to discuss the newspapers' part in the war effort, it was announced yesterday by W. S. Gilmore of the Detroit News, president of the A. S. N. E.

The January session will replace the spring meeting usually held in April, Gilmore said, to provide an opportunity for free discussion between the editors and Government officials of war problems.

Gilmore made his announcement after a session of the War Emergency Committee of the A. S. N. E. with Davis. Editors attending the meeting were Erwin Canham, Christian Science Monitor; Wilbur Forrest, New York Herald Tribune; Alexander F. Jones, Washington Post; David Lawrence, United States News; Dwight Marvin, Troy Record; B. M. McKelway, Washington Star; Roy Roberts, Kansas City Star, and Basil L. Walters, Minneapolis Star Journal and Tribune.

Lieut. Will Rogers, Jr., Accepts Congress Seat

Waco, Tex., Nov. 21 (AP).—Lieut. Will Rogers, jr., Democratic Representative-elect from California, said today he would take his seat in Congress January 3.

His decision was in response to appeals being made by Speaker Sam Rayburn and Secretary Stimson in personal letters to all Congressmen-elect in the armed services, he said.

Rogers, on leave from a tank-destroyer battalion at Camp Hood, Tex., will return there shortly to remain until he goes on inactive status.

Mayflower Unit Addressed by Sen. Brewster

Following divine pattern, an American race will lead the world to greater heights after the war, Senator Ralph O. Brewster (Republican) of Maine, told the Society of Mayflower Descendants last night at their annual Compact Day dinner at Hotel 2400.

Senator Brewster asserted that the American of today must look back to the principles of humility and sturdy independence held by the Pilgrims if a post-war world is to be successfully erected.

"We must be mindful of the tenets of the compact drawn up by the Pilgrims when landing on this soil," he declared, "for it is the spirit of the Pilgriams that is going to be essential in any solution of the problems of the present."

He advised that the Americans "stand up and assert themselves and their rights as free men" in the chaotic world of today. It is only by observing the past and its examples of righteousness he said, that builders of the "new world" will be guided in their work. The Bible, he stressed, must also be referred to in anything we do of importance.

Boise 'Caught Japs Unawares' Lieut. Comdr. Butler Explains

Lieut. Comdr. William Clayton Butler, jr., returned to his home here yesterday from the hero cruiser Boise with the Navy Cross for heroism and his recollection of "the black night" and the Boise's flaming swinging guns that sent six Jap warships to the bottom.

Sandy haired, slightly built, good natured, a cadet captain at Central High School in 1925, the lieutenant commander had much to remember and something, despite restrictions, to tell. He took the naval communique of America's big naval victory off the Solomons and highlighted its lines.

"We caught them unawares," he said.

The action, at start, was like entering a dark room and there starting a fight. And the cruiser's guns fired so fast he was unaware of the shock of returning hits upon the Boise.

On the bridge where he was stationed—and stayed for 20 hours—water splashed from near hits and the smell of burning paint was more noticeable for a while than anything else. And throughout the fighting—which appeared to him like firing in a shooting gallery as the Jap ships burned in line on the horizon, like "knocking off ducks"—the crew worked with great precision, he said.

The crew talked about it later, and one said, "there's no use of ever worrying because the one that gets you will have your name on it." The reply was that nobody worries about the ones with individual names; it's those marked "to whom it may concern" that have to be avoided.

Later, Admiral Halsey, commander of the victorious fleet, came aboard and awarded a few medals and citations.

"The participation of businessmen and its interests in the District is particularly important to the entire civilian defense effort," said McLachlen. "Colonel Bolles is taking a long step forward toward having a closer integration of effort than has been possible thus far."

Civilian defense will be presented in all its phases by Col. Lemuel Bolles, executive director of Civilian Defense for the Metropolitan area: Tucker, Chief Air Raid Warden William J. Mileham and John J. Hasley.

Maj. G. J. B. Furness of the British army will be the principal speaker. Other speakers will be Coordinator Young, Commissioners Guy Mason and Brig. Gen. Charles W. Kutz.

Women FWA Workers To Meet on Tuesday

A meeting of all women employed by the Federal Works Agency and its constituent units will be held Tuesday at 4:45 p. m. in the auditorium of the north Interior Building to inform the employes of the opportunities open in the local civilian defense program, Maj. Lust's committee will act as a clearing unit for all tickets for servicemen here on leave. Already, under the guidance of Mrs. Sidney Thomas, former chairman of the committee, and Mrs. Clara W. Smith of the D. C. WPA, 120,000 tickets have been collected.

Volunteers Ready For Meat Rationing

Twenty-nine out of 66 civilian defense areas report their Victory Volunteer Corps block organization ready to carry the voluntary meat rationing campaign to housewives by November 30, it was announced yesterday by Mrs. Olive W. Swinney, executive secretary of the Civilian Mobilization Area Civilian Defense.

Four thousand Victory Volunteers, representing these areas, will carry information on the "share-the-meat" program to families in their blocks, the first Federal War Food Information program attempted.

Area civilian mobilization chairmen are enlisting women as zone leaders, block captains and block workers. The ultimate organization of the Victory Volunteer Corps will consist of one worker to every 20 families all over the city.

Mayflower Unit Addressed by Sen. Brewster

Following divine pattern, an American race will lead the world to greater heights after the war, Senator Ralph O. Brewster (Republican) of Maine, told the Society of Mayflower Descendants last night at their annual Compact Day dinner at Hotel 2400.

Senator Brewster asserted that the American of today must look back to the principles of humility and sturdy independence held by the Pilgrims if a post-war world is to be successfully erected.

"We must be mindful of the tenets of the compact drawn up by the Pilgrims when landing on this soil," he declared, "for it is the spirit of the Pilgriams that is going to be essential in any solution of the problems of the present."

He advised that the Americans "stand up and assert themselves and their rights as free men" in the chaotic world of today. It is only by observing the past and its examples of righteousness he said, that builders of the "new world" will be guided in their work. To Whom It May Concern:

The United States Marine Corps is just about to raise the morale of approximately 250 American civilians . . . specifically the men who next season will walk up to the plate in the American League with bats in their hands . . . they will get a lift out of the announcement to be made shortly that the Marine Corps has commissioned Ted Lyons, knuckle ball ace of the Chicago White Sox, as a lieutenant . . . Freddy Corcoran, tournament manager of the Pro Golfers Association, and Joe Cronin will be shipmates bound for England before the month is out . . . they have both been given Red Cross details and, like Cronin, Corcoran has declined pay for his services . . . Auburn Stops Ga., 27-13, In Big Upset

Bulldogs Stunned As Tigers Rise Up And Smear Chances For National Title

By the Associated Press

Columbus, Ga., Nov. 21.—You may bow in silent meditation tonight for a gridiron empire that was.

Georgia lost today to a brilliant and underrated Auburn, 27-13, and the crash of America's No. 1 football team probably resounded all the way to Pasadena, Calif.

While 20,000 hysterical fans looked on—a goodly majority cheering for Auburn—the Tigers of mild Jack Meagher snatched a rumored Rose Bowl invitation out of Georgia's hip pocket and kicked it all around Memorial Stadium in a decisive 56-minute rout.

Bulldogs Holler "Uncle"

Georgia won the toss and scored the first touchdown within four minutes of the opening kickoff. Then Auburn took the initiative and hammered Georgia until the boys from Athens hollered "uncle." Six minutes and 13 plays were all it took for Big Jim Reynolds and will-o'-the-wisp Monk Gafford to whipsaw Georgia for a 7-6 lead, and from there on Auburn devoted itself exclusively to knocking Georgia out of a national championship.

At half time Auburn was leading, 14-6. . . .

At the third quarter it was still 14-6, and Georgia fighting for a break to turn the tide. Then Auburn punched over another touchdown, watched Georgia match it, and finally lashed out with the coup de grace, a fourth touchdown scored when Frankie Sinkwich was knocked down behind his own goal in an attempt to pass, and Fagan Canzoneri fell on the fumbled ball.

Kills National Title Hopes

The spectacular upset—the second in two weeks for the up-and-down Auburn's—snapped Georgia's string of victories at 15 straight and knocked out what had promised to be a national championship game at Athens a week hence when Georgia meets Georgia Tech. While Georgia was going down to defeat,

Terps Have Time Beating W. & L., 32-28

By Merrell W. Whittlesey

Maryland closed its golden anniversary football season in victory yesterday but no team in the 50-year gridiron history of College Park was happier to hear the final gun than Clark Shaughnessy's dazed and bewildered charges.

A Washington and Lee eleven which had been kicked all over the South, compiling one of the worst football records of that famous Virginia university had suddenly come to life with 14 points in the last three minutes but time ran out on the gallant Generals and left them on the short end of a 32-to-28 score.

The 8000 fans gathered in Byrd Stadium for Maryland's home-coming clash settled back after Maryland ran up 20 points in the first period, expecting the Terps to close the school's most successful season in several years in high scoring fashion.

The Old Liners were just about through after that first period, however, and for the last three periods they were outscored, four touchdowns to two, by the Generals, who produced a 16-point scorer in little Dave Russell. The 160-pound halfback ran 75 yards with a recovered fumble, scored on a pass from Bill Babcock, a play which covered 61 yards, and in addition he booted four extra points.

Russell's marvelous catch of a

Ohio State Defeats Michigan; Takes Title

Buckeyes, Scoring Three Times Through Air, Register 21-7 Victory Before 71,896 Fans

By the Associated Press

Columbus, Ohio, Nov. 21.—Ohio State, a brilliant precision football machine, overpowered its bitterest rival, Michigan, 21 to 7, to win an undisputed Western Conference championship today.

The victory was sweet to Ohio in more ways than one. It was the first time the Bucks have beaten Michigan since 1937, and it was the first win over a Michigan team coached by the Wily Fritz Crisler.

The 71,896 fans who saw the game raised Ohio's attendance for five home games to 279,945.

The conference title was Ohio's second since 1939, and the first for its youthful coach, Paul Brown.

Three Scores on Passes

Ohio's three touchdowns came on passes. . . . Passes that were handled with deadly accuracy despite a slippery ball. But the Bucks' winning margin of two touchdowns came as its alert, hard-charging eleven capitalized on two breaks.

Michigan also set up its only score on passes, although the touchdown was scored through the line.

The fact that both teams resorted to the aerial game attested to the power of Michigan's "seven oak posts," the linemen who played the entire 60 minutes with only one substitution, and Ohio's stellar line.

It was an Ohio lineman, Charles Csuri of Cleveland, who paved the way for the first score. Csuri, the Bucks' All-America tackle candidate, broke through in the second period to block a punt by Michigan's Tom Kuzma. Ohio got the ball on the Wolverine 35.

Turn About Nets Touchdown

Little Les Horvath, 166 pounds of dynamite, hurled a 20-yard pass to speedy Paul Sarringhaus. Then the two halfbacks reversed the procedure. Horvath passed from the 12 to Sarringhaus over the goal line.

Ohio led, 7 to 0, at the half after almost taking the heart out of the Wolverines by stopping them on the 3-yard line after an aerial attack had taken them 40 yards. The half-time gun was all that kept Michigan from scoring.

After an exchange of punts in the third period, Ohio got the ball on its own 36. Three plays later Sarringhaus and lanky Bob Shaw, Ohio end engineered a 58-yard touchdown pass play.

Sarringhaus pitched the ball 23 yards to Shaw, who grabbed it on the Michigan 35. Stepping along like a toe dancer a few inches inside the sideline, Shaw eluded three tacklers to cover the distance to the goal.

Michigan got back into the ball game with its own aerial attack. Taking an out-of-bounds kickoff on their own 35, the Wolverines

62-Yard Yale Pass Defeats Harvard, 7 to 3

By the Associated Press

Yale Bowl, New Haven, Conn., Nov. 21.—Gridiron glory returned to Yale today as Hugh Knowlton and Townsend W. (Tim) Hoopes maneuvered a 62-yard touchdown pass in the gathering dusk of the final period to whip Harvard's Crimson, 7 to 3, before a small collection of 23,500 fans in Yale Bowl.

It was a sudden, surprising stab that ended Harvard's hex over the Elis, who had not been able to score against their historic foe since 1939, and it gave Yale the championship of the Big Three.

The blow came with six minutes to play in the last quarter and developed so quickly that there was little drama in it.

Knowlton, a 19-year-old sophomore, had entered the game a few moments earlier when the Elis were tired and trailing by three points as the result of an 18-yard Harvard field goal in the second stanza. His first action was to return a punt mildly seven yards to Yale's 38. Then on his first offensive play he faded back and threw a sharp pass to Hoopes in midfield. The receiver was soon surrounded by a swarm of Crimson jerseys, but reversed his field and dashed across the field and goalward without interference.

Fred Dent placekicked the extra point. Then came the drama, because Harvard took the succeeding kickoff and drove 93 yards before

Ceryance Helps Lions Beat Bisons

By Anne Hagner

The guardin'est goalie to tend a Washington net all season—that is what 3000 fans last night dubbed newcomer Frank Ceryance as he personally received much of the credit for the Lions' 4-to-3 victory over the Buffalo Bisons at Uline Arena.

On loan from the Hershey Bears, Ceryance brought about the Lions' first victory in four starts over Buffalo, now leading the standings of the American Hockey League, as he made 35 saves—most of them of the sensational variety. Gordon Bell, Bison goalie, was credited with 10 saves.

The addition of Ceryance to the

Hoyas Trample Colonials to Take Mythical D. C. Championship

By Bill Burnett

Post Staff Writer

In the best traditions of their 52-year rivalry—uninterrupted success for Georgetown and futility for George Wahhington University—the Hoyas romped to a 21-0 victory over the Colonials yesterday.

It was the oft-told story of a punchless G. W. U. team smeared in its attacking attempts. Ten thousand Griffith Stadium fans watched Georgetown turn back the one, lonesome scoring threat of the Colonials.

George Washington's annual effort to beat the Hoyas was a sorry one. Four minutes after the opening kick-off, Halfback Frank Seano fumbled the pass from center the first time the Colonials were in possession of the ball, and Georgetown recovered on the G. W. U. 19-yard line to pave the way for a rapid touchdown.

A look at the passing statistics was indicative of the kind of battle it was. Between them the teams tried 60 aerials, completing 11. Nine, however, fell into enemy hands. G. U., which was completing a record of five won, three lost, and one tied for the season, made good on 12 of 28 tosses, 6 to its own players and as many to the opposition.

Closing its first year under the guidance of former Grad Johnny Baker with its sixth loss in nine games, George Washington was beaten from the first five minutes on. It never was a serious threat as it sought to break a Georgetown University deathlock of the series which dated back to 1890.

If there was an individual star on the field he was Johnny Barrett, senior fullback who scored two of the winning touchdowns. But a lot of futile scrambling on the part of everybody interspersed the Hoyas' three touchdown marches.

G. W. miscued the first time it got the ball and Georgetown made it pay off. Frank Seno attempted a dash through center as G. U.'s opening drive had fizzled, fumbled, and big George Perpich recovered

30,000 See Army Trounce Princeton, 40-7

By Bob Considine

New York, Nov. 21.—Army made a stumbling sparring mate out of Princeton today at the Yankee Stadium, drubbing the Tigers 40 to 7 before a crowd of 30,000.

With one eye cocked on next week's big game against Navy, and the other eye on an adding machine, the dynamic Cadets sprayed through Princeton's line like a fire hose through a picket fence. They scored in every period when they were not rolling to touchdowns by means of ground plays they passing Princeton dizzy.

The lone Princeton tally was the result of three fourth-period desperation passes that clicked against Army's third string team.

By that time Army was far beyond reach and well on its way to scoring one of its most decisive victories in years.

The Cadets finally amassed 514 yards as opposed to Princeton's 162. Princeton's running streak functioned for only 48 yards against the Army's front at barrier, while an endless stream of Army backs were running 388 yards through and around the Tiger line.

The entire West Point Cadet Corps, witnessing their final games of the season, and perhaps for the duration, saw Hank Mazur open the floodgates of Army touchdowns in the first period by sparking a 100-yard march and passing to Tom Lombardo for the first Army score.

Army swept 63 yards in two plays to score its second touchdown. Carl Anderson reversed from his 37 to Princeton's 26. Then Bob Woods, who transferred from Navy, gave warning that he'll be a boomerang next week by charg-

Hines' No-Yardage Punt for Hoyas Shortest Yet

Much to the surprise of no one, Georgetown is still the college grid champion of Washington proper today, and least surprised of all is George Washington's first-year coach, Johnny Baker . . . Lafayette Ties Lehigh, First Time Since 1889 Game

By the Associated Press

Easton, Pa., Nov. 21.—Lafayette and Lehigh, staging the seventy-sixth game in the Nation's longest unbroken gridiron series, battled to a 7-to-7 tie here today before 18,000 fans. It was the third deadlock in the long rivalry and the first stalemate since 1889.

Only a stout defense by Lehigh prevented a Lafayette triumph as the Leopards reached the 1-yard stripe in the closing moments of play.

Northwestern Bows To Irish Power, 27-20

By the Associated Press

South Bend, Ind., Nov. 21.—Otto Graham's brilliant passing failed to match the effects of Notre Dame's pulverizing ground attack led by Sophomore Fullback Corwin Clatt today and the Irish snatched a 27-to-20 victory from Northwestern before a crowd of 30,000.

The Irish had to fight from behind twice in the first half to match Northwestern touchdowns and stalemate the score 13 to 13 at intermission, but in the third period Notre Dame pushed across two markers to hole the Wildcats so badly they could not emerge despite a 48-yard drive to a score in the last period.

It was the twenty-second game in the schools' bitter rivalry and left the Irish with 17 wins in the series. The Purple have lost eight out of nine starts this season, including today.

All the game's touchdown output was hooked on the end of long drives. Northwestern marched 39 for the first score when Ed Hirsch rammed over the 2. Clatt capped a 60-yard Irish push with a 5-yard buck before the opening quarter closed.

A 70-yard march by Northwestern in the second quarter blossomed into a score when Graham passed 17 yards to Dud Kean. The Irish came back 61 yards with Clatt wriggling over from the 1. Sub Al Pick kicked one Northwestern extra point while Angelo Bertelli added one for the Irish to clamp the count 13 to 13 at the half.

Notre Dame tucked away the victory in the third, going ahead for the first time on a 79-yard jaunt spearheaded by Clatt's 47 yards of turf ripping in three plays. Sophomore Bob Livingstone topped it off with a 14-yard bolt into the end zone and Bertelli's toe fired the conversion.

With three minutes left in the period, Clatt filched Don Buffmire's pass and raced 15 yards to the Northwestern 44. From there, Bertelli whipped a pass to Joe Limont then connected for a 31-yard touch-

Minnesota Beaten By Wisconsin, 20-6

By the Associated Press

Madison, Wis., Nov. 21.—An alert, efficient Wisconsin football team that smashed 61 yards to score in the first three minutes, checked Minnesota's power drives the rest of the way today to gain a 20 to 6 victory before 46,000 fans.

The Gophers fought back gamely but Wisconsin had the stuff to pull through and turn Gopher mistakes to its own advantage.

Wisconsin scored first on a line smash, added a touchdown late in the second quarter on a pass after recovering a Minnesota fumble on the Gopher 32, and counted with a line plunge at the start of the final period after taking the ball on downs on the Minnesota 19.

The victory gave Wisconsin second place in the Big Ten race and one of the best records of recent years with eight wins, one defeat, and a tie.

Wisconsin took the opening kickoff back to its 31 and promptly started a touchdown march. Elroy Hirsch, fleet sophomore halfback, passed to Dave Schreiner, the Badger All-America end, on the 50. Schreiner was forced out of bounds on the Gopher 40.

Pat Harder, plunging fullback, then took a lateral from Quarterback Ashley Anderson and raced around right end to the 18. He went around left end to the 12 on the next shot and on a third try went over tackle to the 4. Another smash through the line by Harder gave the Badgers a touchdown. Harder kicked the point and Wisconsin led, 7 to 0.

The Gophers drove back to the Wisconsin 28 on quick opening smashes by Vic Kulbitski and Bill Daley, but lost the ball on downs on the 21 early in the second period. Later in the quarter the

After two scoreless periods in which the Bruins had two fair chances to tally, Baylor in the third period followed up a pass interception in midfield with a touchdown drive.

What Will Hitler Try to Do Now?

By Edward T. Folliard
Post Staff Writer

Where will Hitler strike next?

This question used to be asked in a tone of awe, much as people in a mystery novel might speculate on who the fiendish murderer's next victim would be. Today the question is again to the fore, but the circumstances are far different. It has now become a sort of gibe or challenge.

Granting that it may be too early to jeer at a man as audacious and as resourceful as Hitler, here is the military situation that gives rise to the question about the Fuehrer's intentions:

Field Marshal Erwin Rommel's battered Afrika Korps is on the run in North Africa, with three Allied armies converging on it; Germany's 1942 campaign in Russia has flopped, and the Russians are now counterattacking in the Caucasus; Italy, Germany's original Axis partner, is worrying about an Allied invasion, and Japan, the other and stronger Axis partner, has just taken a severy beating in an old-fashioned slugfest with the United States' Pacific Fleet, and her troops on Guadalcanal are being chewed up by the Marines and doughboys.

It looked as if the Japs on Guadacanal might be in for a Bataan in reverse. Meantime, on New Guinea, Gen. Douglas MacArthur appeared to be executing another military masterpiece, the final stroke of which should come at any moment with the capture of Buna.

For the first time since the war started, there appears to be no comfort anywhere for the Axis. What, then, is Hitler going to do about it?

Four Choices

Military men said that, so far as they could see, there were only four things for him to do, as follows:

1. Attack the British in the Middle East in an effort to reach the oil fields of Iraq and Iran.
2. Drive from France into Spain, attack Gibraltar and try to close the western end of the Mediterranean.
3. Attack England.
4. Go on the defensive.

All four alternatives appeared to be loaded with danger and difficulties.

To reach the oil of the Middle East the Germans would have two possible invasion routes: through neutral Turkey or by sea and air to Syria. As for the first, there is hardly any doubt now that Turkey would resist an invasion. She has an army of approximately a million men, not to mention reserves. True, the Turks are not as well equipped as they might be, but they are ferocious fighters, and Hitler is not likely to find them a push-over. The other route—from Greece to Syria—would require ships as well as transport planes. Such an invasion would require time to organize, too, and Hitler hasn't got much time. Before they could hope to land in large numbers in Syria, the Germans would have to knock out or capture the British island of Cyprus. That island has been vastly strengthened since the fall of Crete in 1941, and has many advantages that Crete lacked. For one thing, it is near the mainland, and R. A. F. fighter planes based in Syria could easily back up those on the island.

The Italian navy would almost certainly have to be used in any invasion of Syria. The British fleet probably would like nothing better than to meet it in that corner of the Mediterranean.

Risks Are Great

The British have two armies in the general area of Syria, Iraq, Iran and Palestine—the Ninth and Tenth armies. Both probably were weakened to strengthen Gen. Bernard L. Montgomery's Eighth Army before it launched its great attack on Rommel at El Alamein. By this time, however, many of the detached units probably are moving back to the Ninth and Tenth.

An important factor in this connection is the growing Allied air strength in that part of the world. In the event of a German thrust toward the oil of the Middle East, the British and Americans could quickly transfer air strength to the scene of danger.

So much for alternative No. 1. The risks, as can be seen, are very great; but risks have never deterred Hitler. A man who would leave Britain unconquered and turn on colossal Russia, and who then, while engaged with both, would take on the United States—well, a man who would do that would do anything.

Alternative No. 2—a drive through Spain—likewise presents difficulties. Much would depend on whether the Spaniards would oppose the Germans. Gen. Francisco Franco still is indebted to Hitler for his help in the civil war; or, at least, the Germans think so. But some observers are saying that the Spaniards, most certainly would fight, and the Spaniards, it is being recalled, were the inventors of guerilla warfare.

But Hitler would run into other difficulties in Spain. The country has no food to spare for an invading army, and it is poor in other vital resources. Besides this, a German invasion of Spain would gravely extend Hitler's lines of communication.

Of course, if Hitler could close the Strait of Gibraltar, thus forcing the Allies to continue sending their ships all the way around the tip of Africa, it would be quite a feather in his cap. Still, it would not be nearly so advantageous as a Middle-East drive that would give Germany oil.

Alternatives

Alternative No. 3—An all-out attack on England—would, if chosen by Hitler, represent an act of sheer desperation on his part. He might try it, military men say, on the theory that Britain weakened herself by sending such large forces to North Africa, and on the theory that it would have an off-chance to succeed.

Would it succeed? The prerequisite to a German invasion of England in 1942 or 1943 would be the same as it was in 1940—the annihilation of the R. A. F. If Marshal Goering's Luftwaffe could not achieve that in 1940, it might be asked, how could it hope to achieve it now, when the R. A. F. is so very much stronger?

And now for alternative No. 4—to go on the defensive.

If Hitler goes on the defensive, military authorities say, he probably will do these things: Shorten his lines in Russia, make them as strong as possible, and dig in. Meantime, he would try to develop Russian production and get as much out of the conquered provinces as possible. He would fortify France along both the Atlantic and Mediterranean coasts, hold Italy a prisoner and strengthen such islands as Sicily and Sardinia.

Then, in effect, Hitler would say to the Allies: "All right, come and get me."

His reasoning would be, no doubt, that if he could hold out for two or three years, war weariness would overtake the Allies; and then rather than pay the price of a final and complete victory over Germany, they would be willing to enter into a compromise peace.

Whether Hitler decides on this course, the professionals say, probably depends on the internal situation in Germany. It depends, they believe, on whether he is able to contiue feeding the German people, and on whether he is able to convince them that his star has not yet begun to set.

For Hitler to go on the defensive would be a startling development, indeed. It has been argued that he can't do such a thing. It has been argued that he is like a man on a bicycle; that he either has to keep moving or fall off. But it may be that he will have no choice in the matter, and that the German people will see it that way.

If the German people ever lose faith in Hitler, the German generals undoubtedly will try to ditch him. There was a report out of London last week that something like this already was in the offing. The report said that a junta, or council, of German generals was being formed with the thought of overthrowing the Fuehrer. In military quarters here, however, the belief was that this stage of the war is still a good way off.

Lord Beaverbrook in London, warned that the conquest of North Africa was far from an end of the war. He said it gave the Allies "nothing more than a jumping-off place." Decisive battles still have to be fought, he continued, adding that the war can only be won by a battle against the enemy face to face on European soil.

That is a formidable task for the Allies.

But Hitler also has a formidable task if he thinks he can hold the "Fortress of Europe." His own generals could tell him that there never was a fortress that couldn't be cracked.

Three Armies Converge

Consider the territory that Hitler must defend. A west wall of 2500 miles from the North Cape to the Pyrenees, an east wall of 2000 miles from Finland to the Caucasus, and now a south wall almost as long as the other two combined—the 4000-mile coastline from the French-Spanish border to the eastern end of Greece.

As the week drew to a close, the plight of Field Marshal Rommel appeared to be growing progressively worse. The three armies that were seeking to trap and annihilate his remnants were the Anglo-American army moving from the west, the British Eighth Army coming from the east, and a fighting French army moving up from the Lake Chad area, where the De Gaullists were in power before the American landings on November 7.

This Fighting French army was still more than 900 miles from the Mediterranean, and it looked as if Rommel's fate would have been decided before it covered that vast difference.

During the week Rommel's forces gave up Benghasi without a fight in their wild dash before the onrushing Eighth Army of General Montgomery. The African dispatches said this left only one port from which the "desert fox" might hope to escape by sea—Tripoli, capital of Libya.

But the Italian City of Tripoli was still 400 miles away, and Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower's army storming through Tunisia was much nearer to it than Rommel.

If Rommell decided to stop and fight, it was expected that he would choose El Agheila, a narrow pass along the Mediterranean coast, something like El Alamein, where the pursuit began.

So strong was Allied air power in North Africa, and so numerous were the airfields in the Allies' possession, that observers felt it was next to impossible for the Axis either to give Rommel the reinforcements he would need or to rescue him in Dunkerque fashion.

However, nothing is more hazardous than guessing in the midst of a battle, and it might be well to let events tell the story in the days ahead.

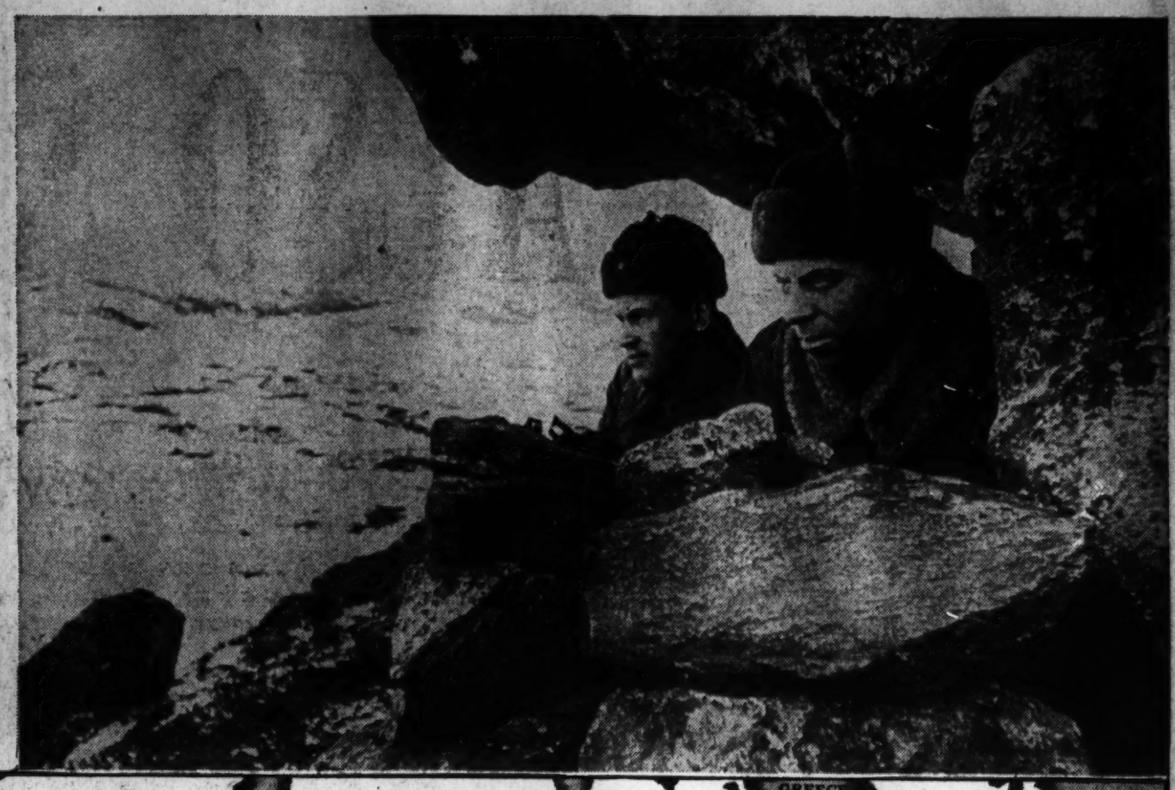
The Russian Front

In the sense that millions rather than thousands are engaged, Russia continued to be the most important front in the war. The view here was that the Germans' 1942 offensive was over. The Germans had been stopped for the year, if not by the Russians, then by the advent of winter. Freezing temperatures had come to all of Russia, even the South. That meant that the Germans would have difficulty in moving supplies; it meant that they would have trouble with their equipment—with frozen radiators, for example.

Generally speaking, the German 1942 offensive has been a resounding failure. They took a lot of territory, it is true, but they did not take enough. They did not reach the main Russian oil fields at Baku. That was certainly one of Hitler's chief objectives.

Now, with a new Mediterranean front to man, it is extremely doubtful if he ever will be able to make any further headway in Russia.

If the Germans don't soon take Stalingrad, they are expected to fall back to the Don River. To remain around Stalingrad would be to present a salient which the Russians could work on during the winter months. If the Germans do take Stalingrad, they will gain very little except some dubious shelter. Their main goal here, Hitler has said, was to cut the Volga; but the Volga now is about to freeze, anyway.



While three armies converge on Rommel in Africa—as indicated on above map—the military experts are wondering what Hitler will try to do next. How will he come to aid of the "Desert Fox" or will be try to come? As far as numbers of soldiers engaged are concerned, Russia continues to be the most important front in the war. A trio of her vigorous fighters are pictured at right above

Victory Over Japs In Pacific May Be "Turning Point"

By John G. Norris
Post Staff Writer

Historians, it seems likely today, will look back on the events of the week before last as one of the great turning points of the war.

Within the short space of seven days the American Army occupied most of French North Africa—changing the entire picture of our war to the east—while almost simultaneously the United States Navy was waging a major victory in the west.

Whatever history will record as the results of these two successes—it is worthy of note now that America was able to carry out two such brilliant operations on opposite sides of the globe while we are still mobilizing our full strength.

It is a matter of fact that was not missed in either Tokyo or Berlin, and must have caused some bad moments when Axis leaders thought of what they face when this Nation reaches its full military power.

Besides this significant conclusion, what are the results of the naval victory over the Japs in the Solomons?

In the first place, of course, the Japanese failed in their objective—recapture of the vital Tulagi-Guadalcanal area of the Solomons. Had they taken the islands, the enemy would have been able to strike heavy blows at our supply lines to Australia and move on to cut them.

It probably means, in fact, that the Japs have been stopped in their march southward, just as the Battle of Midway turned back the enemy from his drive eastward. Time is on our side, and we are growing stronger as Japan's naval strength is weakened in each successive battle.

Unless Japan is willing to risk its main battle fleet against Admiral William F. Halsey's naval forces and land-based air power in a showdown in the Solomons fairly soon, Guadalcanal seems to be ours for keeps.

Japs Hard Hit

For another effect of the naval victory is to enable us to reinforce and supply our base more easily and make it very difficult for Japan to maintain her forces on the island. We should be able to expand our positions there and enlarge the all-important airfield to hold greater air power.

Most important result of the battle, however, was the heavy blow dealt the Japanese navy.

At least one and probably two enemy battleships were sent to the bottom during the November 13-15 fighting (November 12-14, Washington time). Two others were damaged. Eight to nine cruisers and six destroyers were sunk, and other warships were damaged. A total of 28 enemy ships were sunk and 10 were damaged in the battle.

This brings the enemy's fleet losses to an impressive aggregate. Of the 13 battleships that country had at the beginning of the war, one to three have been sunk. Eight others have been damaged—though some of these undoubtedly have been repaired and perhaps the same ones redamaged.

Six of the 12 aircraft carriers Japan had at the beginning of the war have been sunk, and only two others are now in action, it is believed. This does not include about five slow, converted aircraft carriers still in service.

In cruisers, Japan began the war with at least 50 and perhaps 60 cruisers. Thirty-three of these have been sunk and many others damaged. Of perhaps 140 destroyers in service a year ago, Japan has lost 48, plus many crippled.

Our Losses Slight

Of course, Japan has completed some new warships in the past 11 months, but her shipbuilding capacity is far less than that of the United States. The Imperial Japanese navy is very much weaker than it was a year ago, while the United States fleet has completed more combatant ships than it has lost, except for aircraft carriers.

We have lost 4 carriers, besides 1 or 2 battleships, 6 cruisers and 22 destroyers and other auxiliary craft. Newly built carriers will soon be joining the fleet and more are coming up every month or two next year.

One of the greatest blows of the recent Solomons battle to Japan was the destruction of her entire troop transport fleet. Eight vessels, loaded to the gunwales with soldiers and artillery, tanks and supplies, went down in the middle Solomons waters within a few hours. American planes—dive-bombers, torpedo

In the week's cheery budget of news, none was more satisfying than the stunning American naval victory around the Solomons, which is discussed on this page by John G. Norris.

In earlier Pacific battles, Americans had seen that their naval air arm was far superior to Japan's. The Coral Sea and Midway battles demonstrated this in eloquent fashion. What this latest battle demonstrated was that our Navy was pretty good in an old-fashioned sea brawl, as well.

Battle of Jutland

The battle, which found the much-maligned battleships slugging it out, was described as the greatest battle of surface ships since Jutland. At this time, it might be well to recall just what happened at Jutland.

The Battle of Jutland was fought in the North Sea, 75 miles from the Dutch coast, on May 31, 1916. The encounter was the only occasion in the First World War on which rival fleets met.

The battle was fought between the British Grand Fleet and the German High Seas Fleet. The British had 37 capital ships (28 battleships and 9 battle cruisers) and 114 light cruisers, destroyers and other vessels. The German High Seas Fleet consisted of 27 capital ships (22 battleships and 5 battle cruisers) and 74 other men-o'-war.

The action consisted of three engagements. The Germans attempted to entice the British fleet to sea, while submarines were lying in wait for it, and in the hope of concentrating the German High Seas Fleet on a portion of it.

Unusual enemy activity drew the British fleet from its bases. The first engagement was won by the German High Seas Fleet in a running battle with a portion of the British Grand Fleet under Beatty. Beatty, however, turned his force north, leading the German fleet to the British Grand Fleet, under Jellicoe.

In this action, the second engagement, the British inflicted heavy damage. The German fleet escaped behind a smoke screen. The British line turned and the German fleet headed back into it. Visibility was poor throughout the entire battle, and the German fleet was again able to escape under a smoke screen.

The German High Seas Fleet returned to its base and remained there until November 21, 1918, when it surrendered to the British.

The losses were as follows: British—2 battle cruisers, 3 cruisers, 8 destroyers, and 6,097 men killed and 510 wounded; German—1 battleship, 1 battle cruiser, 4 cruisers, 5 destroyers, and 2,551 men killed and 507 wounded.

The battle resulted in a greater immediate loss to the British in ships and men, but left the British in complete control of the seas throughout the remainder of the war. The German fleet remained bottled up in harbor, and from Jutland on the only German naval activity was limited to submarine warfare.

The battle, therefore, was a decisive one.

The Japs lost 28 ships sunk and 10 damaged in the recent sea battle—more than either the British or Germans at Jutland—but the battle was not a decisive one, and nobody in Washington claimed it was. It was not decisive because the Imperial Japanese Navy still is a powerful force and is expected to return to the fray in the very near future.

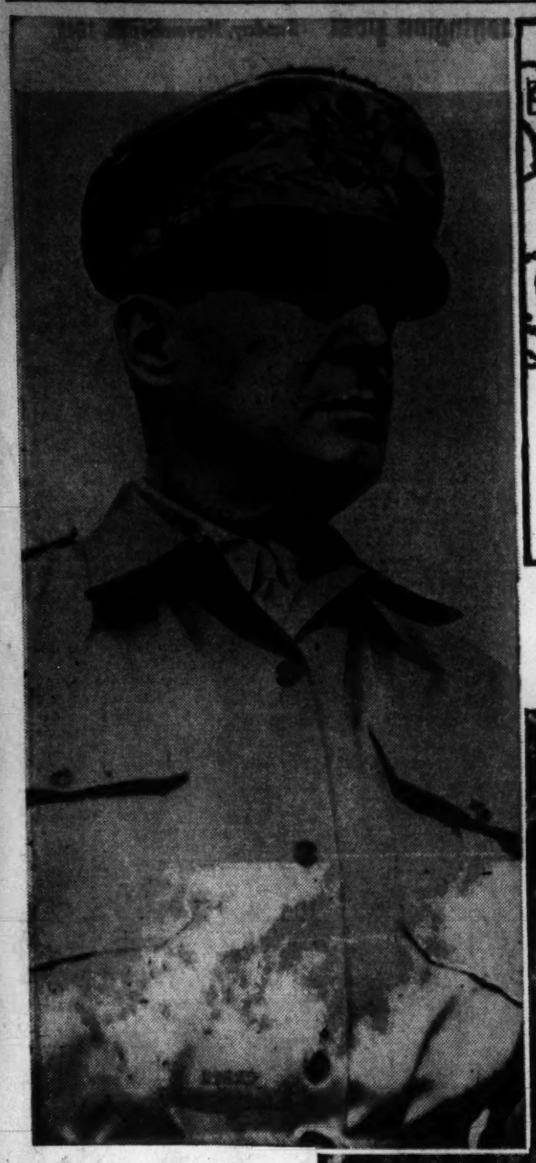
Midway Ranks First

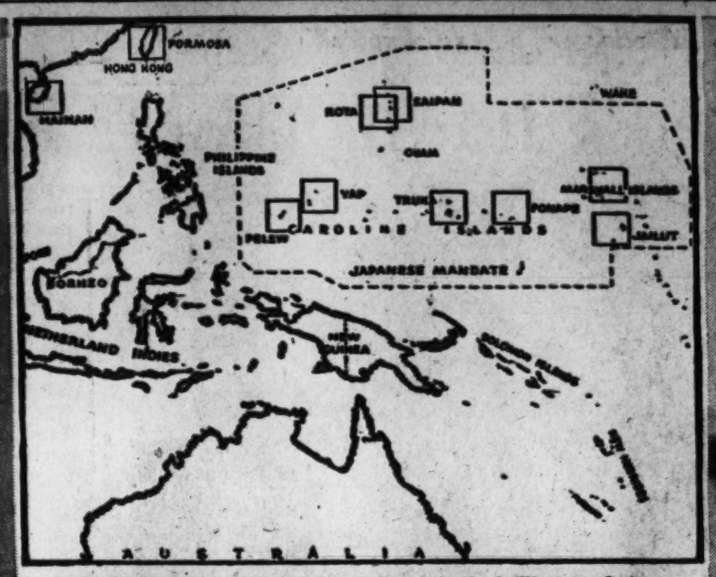
From the standpoint of decisiveness, the Battle of Midway probably takes first rank in the War of the Pacific. The stakes in this battle were tremendous. By stopping the Japs short of Midway Island, the Americans ended a threat to Hawaii and the United States west coast. The victory meant that the Japs thereafter would limit their naval activity to Asiatic waters and the southwest Pacific. Not only had they lost four aircraft carriers, but they had learned what they might expect from American planes based on Hawaii.

The naval battle off the Solomons would not have been decisive even if we had lost. In that case, the Japs would have recaptured islands in the Solomon group which they once held anyway, and we would have fallen back to another defense line at New Caledonia.

Nevertheless, the victory was an important one. Provided the United States Navy can continue to hold the waters around the Southern Solomons, we will be able to pour in reinforcements to Guadalcanal and the Japanese troops on that island will be isolated. Consequently, they might find themselves in the same position Gen. Douglas MacArthur's troops were in on Bataan.

Not only that, but we have now taken a good bite out of the Japanese navy, thus weakening it for the day when the real, all-out drive on Tokyo begins—probably after Hitler has been removed from the picture.





Boldness and speed were the success factors in the brilliant naval victory led by Admiral Halsey (right). In addition to causing the Japanese a major setback, the strategy safeguarded the supply lines to General MacArthur (left) who is leading the offensive in New Guinea. craft and big Army bombers—sent them to the bottom with three to four thousand men apiece.

Four other such craft were destroyed on the beach at Guadalcanal, by planes, warship gunfire and shore batteries. Navy officials say that few if any of enemy troops had landed when this occurred.

History has recorded few such wholesale troop transport losses with such a short time. Of total men killed, though not in strategic importance, it probably exceeded the destruction of the Spanish Armada. It may be that it is the heaviest single transport toll of all time.

This has not been emphasized, because Japan has large numbers of troops not now in action. It was not the blow the warship losses were, though because of the large number of deaths, the defeat will be impossible to conceal at home.

New Guinea Front

News of the past two weeks from the Solomons and Africa has overshadowed and almost obscured important developments in New Guinea.

With Gen. Douglas MacArthur in actual field command, American and Australian troops have virtually driven the Japs from Papua—the eastern end of the huge island. Last summer the enemy had crossed the mountain range of New Guinea and threatened to drive MacArthur's forces out of Port Moresby and engulf the whole island.

Yesterday his troops were about to capture Buna and Gona, the last remaining Jap strongholds in eastern New Guinea. Their fall will leave the enemy only holding footholds at Salamaue and Lae on the northern coast, and these have been under daily bombardment for weeks.

The next job ahead will be to clean the Japs entirely out of New Guinea. Approach to Salamaue and Lae overland, however, will be extremely difficult and uprooting the enemy from there will probably require an amphibious operation. It probably will be undertaken early next year.

For cleaning the Japs entirely out of New Guinea will pave the way for an expedition against Rabaul on New Britain Island to the north. This is Japan's southernmost stronghold and its recapture would permit the regular bombing of an eventual shipborne assaults against the main Japanese bases in the Caroline Islands.

Such a drive against Salamae and Lae and thence an attack on Rabaul are the most likely next Allied moves against the Japs. A movement northeast from Guadalcanal against enemy bases on Buka and Bougainville in the northwest Solomons is not in the cards now, though it might coincide with a later drive against Rabaul from New Guinea.

On Defensive Still

The reason is that, despite the Allied gains and the recent defeat of the Japs, we will still largely be on the defensive and the enemy will still be the aggressor in the southwest Pacific for some time yet.

We still are outnumbered in warships, troops and planes in the area and cannot take the overall initiative until we are able to put more strength in the Pacific. Some observers here feel that we can begin carrying the ball early in 1943, while others believe it will be later in the year.

The next major fight in the area almost certainly will be another Japanese offensive against Guadalcanal.

Tokyo home broadcasts leave no doubt of this. The November 13-15 defeat was so severe that Japanese propagandists had to abandon their usual practice of ignoring losses. They admitted some of them, claiming great American casualties, and stressed the importance of the Solomons to the outcome of the war. In other words, they were telling the people at home that the issue was worth the ships and men lost.

Japanese government spokesmen went on the radio and declared that the Solomons were the "rivet and the key" determining the entire Pacific war. They said that a "fourth and fifth Solomons battles must be fought."

A significant change was noted by naval observers in the Japanese official attitude on the recent battle. Their broadcasts after Midway gave no hint of the major disaster suffered. This time there were alibis offered. They spoke of the "great Japanese navy being tied down" to its transport force, hampering its movements against our fleet.

The truth is that Japan's Fleet has been taking a beating. The reason was first over-confidence and now over-cautiousness. They approached Midway thinking the Americans would be easy, and went away apparently going to the other extreme—afraid to take proper risks.

Japs Keep Trying

Three times now the Japs have sent forces against Guadalcanal but each time their armada—though progressively larger—has not been strong enough for the job. And each time their power has been whittled down.

Their best time for an all-out attack seemed to be after the whipping given America's South Pacific Fleet August 9, when four of our heavy cruisers and lesser vessels were sunk in a night raid.

But when sometime later, they sent what appeared to be a major force against us, it turned back on meeting determined resistance. The second attempt was also strong, but not strong enough.

The latest assault was a powerful one, but still the Jap high command was apparently "sending a boy to do a man's job." In justice to the judgment of the Nipponese admiral in charge, it may be said that his force was bigger than ours but either not big enough or not good enough.

He refused to risk his main battle fleet—none of Japan's new battleships have appeared in action—nor were the remaining few Nipponese carriers hazarded in the battle.

On the other hand, Admiral Halsey sent the new United States battleship North Carolina into action, according to Tokyo reports. Two of our battle wagons took part in the November 14-15 night battle, Secretary Knox disclosed, and did considerable damage to the enemy. Still according to enemy reports, the other American dreadnaught involved was the Idaho, perhaps the best of our older heavy ships.

Not "Capital Ship"

While this action demonstrated what should have been clear all along—that battleships still have a role in warfare—the dreadnaught has by no means regained its former position as the "capital ship" of navies. Aircraft carriers, for the time being at any rate, have taken on this role, and still hold it.

Battleships and other warships whose main armament are heavy guns can go into action only at night whenever air power is near by. That has been the lesson of the Pacific war to date.

Despite some reports to the contrary—including one from Pearl Harbor—it seems likely that no aircraft carriers were involved in the recent Solomons battle on either side. Moreover, Japan has had her land plane strength greatly depleted in recent months.

Verified official reports of the losses of the single Japanese air force operating both in the Solomons and the New Guinea area, announced by the Navy Department and MacArthur, total close to 950 enemy planes destroyed since American forces occupied the Solomons August 8. This does not include plane casualties in the November 13-15 battle, which Tokyo has said amount to 44 Japanese planes. Undoubtedly the loss was larger.

Such a 1000-plane combat loss in three months was undoubtedly a heavy blw to the Japs, and probably accounts for their lack of strong land-based air support from northern Solomon bases in the recent battle.

All of this does not detract from the great victory won by American surface ships in the battle. Their big guns took a terrific toll of the Japanese fleet.

Admiral Halsey, in fact, has emerged as one of the great American naval commanders of all time. "Uncle Dan" Callaghan, Admiral Norman Scott, Capt. Cassin Young and the other officers and men who gave their lives in as daring a naval attack as the world has seen, proved the modern United States Navy is as good as its great heritage.

The greatest naval surface slugfest since the draw at Jutland in 1916 ended in a great American victory. It is the handwriting on the wall for America's enemies.

Labor Board Seeks Simple Procedures

By Leo Wolman

The War Labor Board, building on the foundations laid by the Wagner Act and the extensive powers bestowed upon it by the President, has already effected far-reaching changes in the conditions and procedures of labor relations in this country. By conceding maintenance of membership in an overwhelming majority of cases it has strengthened labor unions far beyond the requirements of the law. It has consistently pursued an unusually liberal policy of wage-fixing. It has assumed jurisdiction over numerous matters of shop policy and practice and by doing so has arrogated to itself the authority to determine the specific terms of many agreements in many industries.

MR. WOLMAN

At the present time the board is being strongly urged to make another radical change in prevailing methods of collective bargaining. This change is the substitution of collective bargaining by industry for bargaining by individual plant or firm. Under this type of arrangement negotiations between labor and employers would be carried on not by the representatives of a single company and the union of its employes but by the agents of an entire industry and the representatives of a national union. The collective agreement thus arrived at would apply throughout the industry.

A resolution adopted by the C. I. O. convention, held in Boston in early November, flatly indorses industry-wide bargaining. The resolution declares that "it is essential that the board, upon request of the union affected, proceed to industry-wide conferences and determinations so that, on the one hand, the board may be freed from the unneccessary repetition of argument and deliberation with respect to each of the hundreds of employers in each industry and, on the other, the board may achieve sound industry-wide stabilization. All contracts arising out of such industry-wide negotiations . . . must make provision . . . for adequate arbitration machinery so that issues thereafter arising may be disposed of for the duration without the necessity of burdening the board's machinery."

Davis Proposes Employer Groups

That this proposal may receive a welcome hearing in the board is suggested by the views of W. H. Davis, chairman, expressed in a statement made on August 9. "Industry-wide collective bargaining," he said, "makes for greater stability throughout an industry, more responsible unions, and puts management on a more fair and equitable competitive basis as far as wage costs are concerned. . . . What we principally need is more organization among employer and management groups. Such organization would do much to promote an equality of bargaining power between management and labor."

But in this form the proposal is not unlikely to win much support from unions, Government, and even employers. With the enormous spread of organized labor, everyone concerned with labor relations is seeking a more simplified and automatic procedure. The unions obviously have much to gain by negotiating a master contract with an industry as a whole which takes the place of a multiplicity of contracts with numbers of companies. Government agencies would be saved much work and trouble if they dealt, as they did under the NRA, with industry groups instead of hundreds or thousands of employers. The employers, already devoting a large fraction of their time to labor relations, might welcome the relief from these burdens which they would earn if they relinquished their labor negotiations to industry committees or representatives.

But whatever might be gained by way of convenience would be more than offset by the very serious problems which the general practice of industry bargaining would create. Failure to join a union would close opportunities for employment in every industry which became a party to such collective bargaining. Union membership would then be compulsory and universal. Inflexibility in labor standards, which on many critical occasions has been a most effective barrier in the way of economic adjustment and, hence, of expanding employment, would become more deeply and more widely embedded in our industrial system than ever before. Constant political and economic pressure would be exerted to bring an independent employer and business under these industry arrangements on the plea that uniform wages and working conditions were responsible for "economic stability."

Industry-Labor Cartels Would Result

In time such arrangements would develop, or degenerate, into joint industry-labor monopolies. They would become the American type of cartel. As such they would soon begin to practice restrictions of output in which both industry and labor joined. Combined with respective practices there would develop the tendency to allocate output among the members of the industry in accordance with some agreed-upon standard of past performance or past volume of business. Since the level of wages would be fixed by agreement for more or less lengthy periods, it would be but a short step to accompany wage-fixing with price-fixing.

These features of industry-wide agreements between labor and employers are not novel phenomena in the history of the United States or other countries. Not so long ago they were forcibly brought to the attention of the American public by the activities of the musicians' union. The Department of Justice has considered them to be almost common practice in the building trades. Certain of them exist in a highly developed state in our railroad industry. That they are not more widely known in this country is simply due to the fact that the combination of strong employers' associations and strong national unions was until very recently limited to a handful of industries. In England, where similar methods have run a much longer course, the same features have existed.

Imposing a new system of collective bargaining on American industry is certainly not a policy which should be adopted as a war measure. Whether employers should bargain singly or collectively has not been an issue which has been a prolific source of wartime strikes. It is not likely to become such an issue unless the Government itself encourages organized labor to promote it. The war, also, and the powers which public agencies derive from the state of war should not be used to initiate fundamental revisions in economic practice and policy, which are not essential to the effective prosecution of the war and whose long-time consequences are, at the least, of questionable value to both labor and industry. The proposal for industry-wide bargaining which the C. I. O. adopted and which Mr. Davis indorsed is an example of a basic change in public policy which, before it is made, merits long and careful consideration. This is not the kind of question which can be settled on grounds of administrative convenience and expediency.

The Washington Merry-Go-Round

By Drew Pearson

Without any fanfare, a very quiet boom has been started by leading Republicans to groom Gov. John Bricker of Ohio as presidential candidate in 1944.

Senator Taft gave it away the other day when he told a senatorial colleague that he would not be a candidate for the presidency in 1944, as he was in 1940.

DREW PEARSON

"Bricker stepped aside for me in '40," Taft said. "He let me have my chance. Now it's my turn to step aside for him.

"Besides," he added, "I like my job here in the Senate, and it costs a lot of money to run for the Republican nomination."

It is also reported that Herbert Hoover and certain others from the conservative wing of the party are quietly behind Bricker. Their idea is that if the G. O. P. avoids too much knock-down bitterness at the convention, and selects a man who appeals to all groups within the party, the 1944 race will be a walk-away.

The Hoover crowd is especially anxious to head off Willkie. They also seem convinced that Dewey means what he says when he promises to remain Governor of New York. This leaves Senator Vandenberg of Michigan as the leading opponent to Bricker in the conservative wing of the party.

Present plan is to avoid bringing Bricker forward as a last minute compromise a la Warren G. Harding. Bricker is sometimes described as a Harding without a sombrero, has a pleasant personality, has not offended too many people, and has not stuck his neck out too far on controversial policies.

Sicily a Battlefield

Diplomatic dispatches received here indicate that Russia is already feeling material relief as a result of the North African campaign. It is well known that the Germans have withdrawn men and planes from the Russian front, but it is not generally known that they have taken planes also from Norway.

These include Nazi torpedo planes, which will be based on Sicily for use against United Nations shipping in the Mediterranean. Thus the planes will not be used against shipping bound over the top of Norway for the Russian port of Murmansk. In other words, the Russians now have a less dangerous supply route.

Sicily is bound to become a battlefield, and the narrow straits between that island at the toe of the Italian boot and Tunisia, on the African shore, will see the hottest air activity of the war.

United States planes will be running, every hour almost on the hour, across the 100-mile strait to Sicily, to bomb the German and Italian fields and forces there, and the Germans in turn will bomb back. The distance is so short that a single plane could make two or three round trips a day, without even stopping to refuel.

It will be the hottest shuttle service in the history of warfare. Whoever has control of the air in that narrow passage will have control of the shipping that attempts to pass to the eastern Mediterranean. And the United Nations will fight for that control as a means of supplying the Middle East and keeping the routes open through the Suez Canal.

This fight cannot be settled soon. The early stages of the African campaign have gone with blitz speed, but the next stages must wait for the slow preparation of airfields on the North African coast, and the bringing up of vast stores of supplies. In short, the American public must get adjusted to a slower pace in that theater of war, from now on.

Note: War planners in Washington are chortling over the fact that the Germans entirely misjudged the objective of the great United Nations armada. When the ships approached Gibraltar, the Germans had no idea the objective was Morocco, but thought it was Crete instead. Consequently, they sent strong reinforcements to that island in the eastern Mediterranean, far from the scene where the American forces actually landed.

Norris Will Go Home

Spry Senator Norris of Nebraska has been flooded with all kinds of offers to take jobs, write a newspaper column, pen his memoirs. However, he has not been receptive to any of them—not even suggestions that he sit on the Supreme Court.

The other day when Nebraska newspapers queried him on a report that the President would appoint him to Jimmy Byrnes' vacancy, Norris dismissed the idea as a pipedream.

SEN. NORRIS

"The only thing I have decided to do is go back to Nebraska," he tells friends. "My job here is done."

Norris has been receiving so much mail that he can't answer it. He has read every letter carefully, and they touch him deeply.

"I wish I could answer them all," he says. "They should be answered, each one of them, individually. And I am afraid these good people will have their feelings hurt when I don't But it would take me months and months to do them justice."

Asked why he doesn't write his memoirs, Norris tells the story of a poverty-stricken manservant who for years could not afford to smoke. Finally, he came into a little money and was asked whether he didn't want a pipe. He replied: "Too many boys are smoking now. A man doesn't smoke anymore."

"That's the way I feel about my memoirs," says Norris. "Everybody's written them, and a man doesn't write 'em anymore."

"Besides," he adds, "if I wrote my memoirs I would want to write about my boyhood. That is the happiest time in a man's life. But I'm afraid writing about it wouldn't interest anyone but me."

Watch Manpower!

The other day Leon Henderson sat down and wrote a letter beginning, "Dear Babe." He was addressing no sweety, but a blue-eyed, 6-foot male named Merrill Meigs, who has borne the nickname "Babe" ever since he played fullback for the University of Chicago.

The occasion for the letter—and a lot of other letters from such persons as Henry Ford, Bill Knudsen and K. T. Keller of Chrysler—was Meigs' retirement from WPB, where for two years he was head of the all-important aircraft section. Civilians are leaving WPB every hour on the hour, and Ferd Eberstadt's Army and Navy friends are taking over.

Meigs insists, however, it's no purge in his case. The only man who asked for his resignation was William Randolph Hearst, who has paid his salary for two years without having his services. Meigs came here from the job of publishing the Chicago Herald and Examiner. He returns to Hearst in a higher capacity, namely, as vice president of the corporation.

It's the question of manpower that will make most trouble in the future, says Meigs as he leaves his desk in Washington. Materials made trouble in the past, and he admits that September aircraft production represented a lower percentage of the goal than any month thus far. But this was because the Army and Navy Munitions Board saw fit to hold back materials from aircraft production, "and damn it, you can't make airplanes without materials!" But a still bigger worry lies ahead, and this is Meigs' parting shot:

"Watch manpower! That's the big problem now. You can't make airplanes without men."

The Poll Tax Filibuster—What's It All About?

Two Senators Present Both Sides of Question

By Claude Pepper

United States Senator from Florida

The American people are entitled to a clear statement on the filibuster now under way in the Senate, and a clear statement of the issues involved in the anti-poll-tax bill of which the late Representative Lee Geyer of California and I are the authors.

A filibuster is a parliamentary device by which a minority of Senators opposed to a bill may "talk it to death" by taking and holding the floor. Using it, a minority may obstruct the will of the majority—which is what is happening now.

Foes of the antipoll-tax bill are conducting what amounts to a "sit-down strike" in order to prevent the Senate from voting on the bill.

Against what are they using this maneuver? Against the Senate's right by democratic action to decide a deeply important question, a question which assumes vastly greater importance now than it ever has before. It is whether citizens of the United States may vote for Federal officials without paying a sum of money for the privilege.

Today America offers the principal hope democracy has left in the world. We have set our hearts and pledged our strength to preserve here a haven for free men. We have undertaken a task almost frightening in its immensity.

All over the earth our sons are fighting, boys from the homes of rich and poor and middle class alike. They are in Algiers, and the Solomons; in Iceland and India; in England and Australia, ready to lay down their lives that this Nation might continue to be the beacon for all men who yearn after freedom and justice, who seek after this thing men feel more clearly than they can define—this thing called democracy.

This Is War to Death

Yet we witness a filibuster in our own Senate against the very democracy we are fighting to preserve! While these boys are fighting to extend democracy, a handful of Senators fight to limit it!

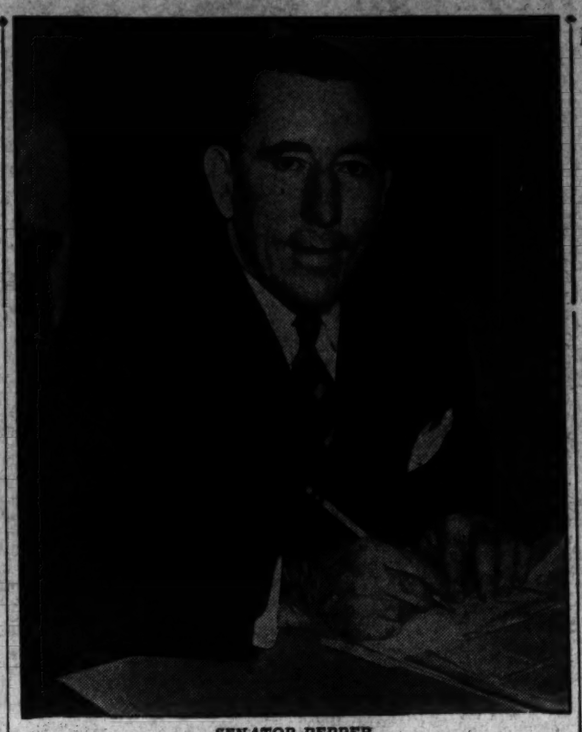
The Atlantic Charter, uttered by two great leaders of this crusade for humanity, has now been made a declaration of faith and purpose by all the United Nations, a Bill of Rights for all mankind. The Four Freedoms are its core and spirit. We are desperately in earnest about these declarations. The battle we fight is no mock contest. It is no tournament where brave men joust for some fair lady's smile. This is war to the death for millions, for nations and for one of two kinds of world.

There have been many who have asked from time to time whether this is just another war. They want to know whether it is a war for imperialism, for power, for trade, for territory.

The poll tax is a levy ranging from one to two dollars a year which a citizen of eight Southern States must pay before he or she may vote either for Federal or State officials.

In some States the voter must have paid the tax for every year since he became 21 before he may vote in any election. In all but one of those States it applies to primary as well as general elections. It must be paid at stated times, ranging from one to nine months before the primary or general election—long in advance of the election itself. In some States it is required by the State constitution, in others it is a matter of State statutes.

It is common knowledge that the poll tax has been an instrument of political corruption, a ready weapon in the hands of the political manipulator with money to buy the sovereign right of the citizen to vote.



SENATOR PEPPER

It is also a painful fact that the poll tax has been a grievous deterrent of the exercise of the voting franchise in the States where it existed. Outside the areas, for example, where the poll tax is required, the number of persons voting in congressional districts is close to 75 per cent of the adult population of the districts; but in the poll-tax States the average of the adult population voting in the congressional districts is about 23 per cent of the adult population. This is true of primaries, while in general elections it runs about 15 per cent.

Of interest to America's women voters is the fact that in Louisiana after abolition of the poll tax, the number of women voters increased by 77 per cent. After repeal of the Louisiana poll tax, there was an increase of 64 per cent in the vote cast in two gubernatorial primaries as compared to the average of two pre-repeal primaries. And in a senatorial primary, there was an increase of 90 per cent once the poll tax was abolished.

Removed in Florida

In Florida, perhaps, occurred the most striking result of removing a poll tax in terms of votes cast. In that State the average number of votes cast in two primaries for United States Senators increased 140 per cent over the average for four preceding primaries when the poll tax was required.

I know a few who justify such a poll tax as consistent with the democracy for which we are fighting all over the earth. There are some, of course, who dare not utter the real sentiments which they cherish. There are still some who do not want to lift the yoke of economic and political subjugation from the necks of those who have so long worn its galling burden. There are still some in this great land who believe in democracy for themselves but not for other people. But these, thank God, are the diminishing few.

Those now resisting the effort being made in Congress to eliminate the poll tax as a condition to voting in elections for Federal officials rely upon the mandates of the Federal Constitution. They give us, for example, the language formulated by the Founding Fathers in 1787 as giving to the States themselves exclusive power to determine who for all time shall be able to vote for those who shall constitute the elected officials of the National Government.

States Charge Violation

The States assert that their rights are being violated by the Geyer bill, which passed the House by the substantial margin of 252 to 84, and by my bill now pending before the Senate.

But I think I may say that the question of the constitutionality of Federal action has been fairly presented in the following quotation from a recent decision of the United States Supreme Court.

"While in a loose sense the right to vote for representatives in Congress is sometimes spoken of as a right derived from the States, this statement is true only in the sense that the States are authorized by the Constitution to legislate on the subject as provided by Section 2 of Article I, to the extent that Congress has not restricted State action by the exercise of its powers to regulate elections under Section 4 and its more general power under Article I, Section 8, Clause 18, of the Constitution, 'To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers.'"

It is because I love my South that I believe this issue is worth fighting for. It is because I love its traditions, its tremendous contribution to the birth of democracy in the world, that I say now the American people must make certain here at home that there is established the fullest kind of democracy.

By Joseph C. O'Mahoney

United States Senator from Wyoming

The question involved in the current Senate debate is not whether there should be poll tax reform. It is not whether a filibuster is a justifiable legislative device. The sole question is whether or not Congress has the power, by legislative enactment to invalidate State laws which make the payment of a poll tax a prerequisite for voting in Federal elections.

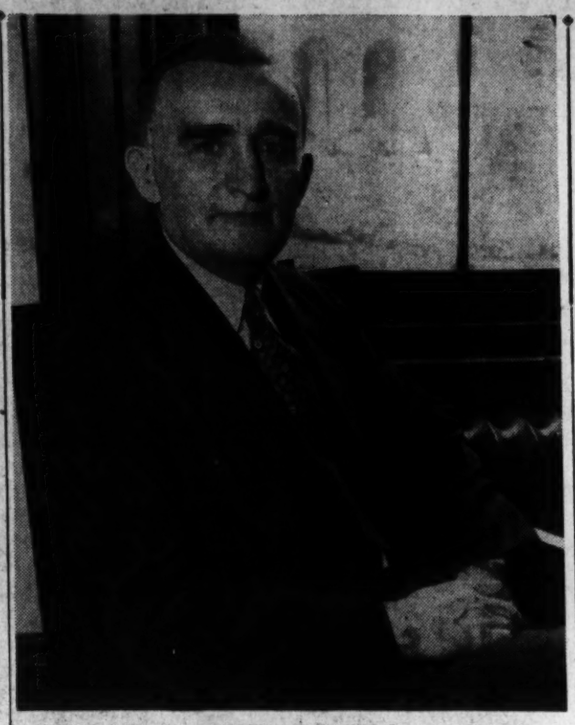
The argument must not, therefore, be confused by any contention that the right to vote should not be restricted by a tax requirement. If poll tax reform alone is all that the proponents of this legislation desire, it can be constitutionally obtained by constitutional amendment, just as the woman suffrage reform was accomplished. The Legislatures of most of the States will be in session in January, 1943, or shortly thereafter and, if all of the poll tax States should decline to ratify an amendment, they still could not prevent the reform against the forty States which have already abolished poll taxes as a voting requirement.

The argument likewise must not be confused with the question as to whether or not the right of unlimited debate, which survives only in the Senate, should be exercised by a minority of the membership to defeat a measure to which the minority is opposed. If this were the argument, it would be necessary only to cite the fact that Senator George W. Norris, one of the supporters of the effort to abolish the poll tax by statute, was himself one of the most prominent and effective participants in the famous filibuster of February and March, 1917, against President Wilson's effort to secure legislation authorizing the arming of merchant vessels and that in times past the filibuster has been used by some of the most able and liberal members of the Senate.

Only One Question

There is only one question in this controversy, namely, whether this desirable reform—and I call it a desirable reform because I personally believe that the poll tax requirement ought to be abolished—may be brought about by legislative enactment. On this question there is not the slightest doubt in my mind. The Congress does not have the power to determine by statute what the qualifications for voting should or should not be and it should not attempt to exercise that power, because to do so would be an invasion of State authority and would tend to the breakdown of State government. If the Congress has the right to say negatively what shall not be a qualification, then it has the equal right to say positively what the qualifications for voting shall be. It is thus only one step from this bill to the complete federalization of our Government.

Nowhere in the Constitution can any language be found which grants to the Federal Congress the authority to fix the qualifications of those who are to vote for Federal officials. When the instrument was drafted, only members of the House of Representatives were to be chosen by the people. Senators were to be elected by State Legislatures and even the President was to be chosen by an electoral college. The founders of the Government erected obstacles between the people and all of their elected Federal officials except member of the House.



SENATOR O'MAHONEY

They were distinctly not thinking in terms of universal suffrage or even of universal manhood suffrage. They were thinking of a Federal Union, "an indestructible union of indestructible States," as it was once eloquently called, and they recognized the right of the separate States to fix the qualifications of the electors who should choose the members of the House of Representatives.

In Plain Language

This they did in the following plain language of Section 2, Article I:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

In Senator Pepper's original bill we find the declaration that a requirement for the payment of a small poll tax bears "no reasonable relation to the intelligence, ability, character, wealth, community consciousness or to the least qualifications of voters."

But the drafters of the Constitution were thinking of qualifications in terms of the requirements which the States at that time were imposing for the purpose of determining who had the right to vote, and in each of the original States the suffrage depended, at that time, in one degree or another, on some form or property or tax qualification. The men who drew the Constitution and prescribed the powers of the Federal Congress all came from States in which the right of suffrage was limited by State law to certain classes of the people. It is, therefore, a repudiation of common sense, of historical fact and of the plain language of the fundemanetal law to say that when the constitutional convention adopted Section 2, Article I, it was not thinking of tax payments as a proper qualification for voting.

If there were any doubt about this, it would be removed by an examination of the debate in the constitutional convention.

Restriction Defeated

Governeur Morris of New York, who was fearful that the right of suffrage would eventually be extended by the States and who believed there should be some property qualification, made a formal motion for the purpose of restricting the right to vote to freeholders. His motion was defeated.

Finally, if there were any doubt that by Section 2, Article I, the Federal Constitution determines what the qualifications for voters shall be, it would be resolved by the present Supreme Court, which, speaking through Justice Stone, in United States vs. Classic, 313 U. S., 299-314, asserted:

"Section 2, Article I, commands that Congressmen shall be chosen by the people of the several States by electors, the qualifications of which it prescribes."

Upon this issue it seems to me there can be no debate. Between the Constitution and the Pepper bill we must choose the Constitution.

GALLERY GLIMPSES

By Robert DeVore

Post Staff Writer

In one section of the Senate gallery during the Senate's anti-poll tax bill filibuster last week, seats were nearly always at a premium.

Serious young men sat there, young men with a deadly serious mission.

They seldom indulged in whispered conversation, as do most galleryites. They spent their time listening, not for a few minutes, but for a half hour, or an hour, or more. They seemed to be appraising the scene before them, and this attitude of deepest study appeared incongruous on those occasions when the only occupants of the floor were one or two leaders and a Senator lengthily expounding some obstruse parliamentary question.

These young men wore the uniform of the Army, Navy and Marine Corps. Most of them were in enlisted ranks, young men who expected, in a short time, to be on the battle lines of a war they have been told is for the survival of the kind of government they were seeing in action. Some of them were there for the first time, others, possibly, for the last.

Could it be that their minds were clutching for some glowing long-to-be-remembered truth to carry into battle? Why were they there? What were they thinking?

Seven of them were interviewed and here is what they said they thought:

Sergt. Sam Robb—"There shouldn't be a filibuster in wartime. He (Senator Doxey (Democrat) of Mississippi) has been talking for an hour and I haven't heard him say anything yet, at least not anything that I could understand. He's been up there just talking all this time."

Sergt. Duane J. Shriver "of Iowa"—"Unless they have something important to do, I suppose they might as well fool around like this. There have been times in the history of this country when the filibuster has been the only means of holding up bad legislation until the majority could take charge. There should, however, be some control over the filibuster."

Pvt. Ernest Doubek of Chicago—"The filibuster is no good. He (Senator Doxey) could have said in 15 minutes all that he has been trying to say for an hour."

Ensign Eliot Stone, U. S. N., Boston—"They shouldn't be taking up the time of the Senate in this way. A bill like that should be relegated to the minor role it really has. It seems to me that an issue like this might well be suspended for the duration. On the basis of my experience in Washington, I would say they would do a lot better if they would attend to Washington's housing problem.

"If a man has something of importance to say, he should say it and stop."

Ensign Roland A. Niles, U. S. N., Springfield, Mass.—"I think it is just a plain waste of time—in peace or war. That's all I've got to say."

A sailor who refused to identify himself—"It looks like they are wasting time in there. That certainly is not the sort of thing we are fighting for."

Lieut. Grant C. Parsons, U. S. M. C., Salt Lake City—"It seems to me they are wasting a lot of time in there. That is wrong."

Pvt. Simon Gerstein, Boston—. "If they are not paying a poll tax in the other States, why should anyone have to pay it in the South?"

In Senate corridors last week, friend and foe alike had words of praise for the manner in which Senator Alben W. Barkley, the majority leader, absorbed the vicious attack of Senator Kenneth McKellar (Democrat) of Tennessee.

It was Barkley's motion that brought the poll tax fight onto the Senate floor. It was Barkley's motion that brought the issuance of warrants for the "arrest" of McKellar and six other filibustering, but absent, Senators. McKellar resented the former action of the majority leader. He was incensed over his "arrest."

Without question, McKellar is the most savage rough-and-tumble debater in the Senate. He gives and asks no quarter, and he was pulling no punches on Barkley. His attack was both personal and against Barkley's official position. He nominated Senator Connally (Democrat) of Texas, leader of the opposition to the bill, as "my new leader."

Barkley's reply was soft, kindly, almost magnanimous. He talked without a trace of bitterness, only regret. He hoped for continued friendship with McKellar, esteem from his associates, but he was sentimentally moderate. He closed with a funny story.

It may be that the performance saved Barkley his leadership. Certainly, the cloakroom grumbling became less bitter and traces of a move to name a new commander melted away.

Senator A. B. ("Happy") Chandler of Kentucky doesn't believe any Senator should be told by opponents of any legislation he happens to favor that they will allow his bill to come before the Senate if he will agree beforehand that the bill will be defeated.

That, briefly, is why the Senator objected last Thursday to the Senate accepting by unanimous consent the terms proposed by Senator Tom Connally (Democrat) of Texas, for bringing the poll-tax filibuster to a close. The Senator entered his objection despite the obvious desire of his colleague and majority leader, Senator Barkley of Kentucky, to accept peace terms.

But as much as he objected to the terms of the armistice, he objected more to the fact that they were being "dictated" by the leader for the opposition, Senator Connally.

Chandler used to play baseball. Certainly no old baseball player would agree that his team should accept the other team's version of what the final score should be before the game had been played.

The United Nations State Their Creed

Justice, Democracy, Tolerance Urged in Postwar Building

By Sumner Welles

Undersecretary of State

Tonight we of the United Nations have the right to look ahead, not only with hope and with passionate conviction but with the assurance which high military achievement affords, to the ultimate victory which will presage a free world.

The first months of confusion and of cross-current are past. The men and women of the United States are now enabled to see for themselves the development of the strategic moves in which their commander in chief and their military and naval leaders are engaged.

They can now fully evaluate the lack of vision and of knowledge of those who demanded the abandonment of our whole policy toward the French people, at the very moment that that policy was afforded the striking opportunity of proving its full worth—its full worth to the cause for which we fight, and its full worth in preserving the soul of France during the darkest days she has ever known; France, the birthplace of so many of those principles of human liberty for which we and the people of France once more battle today.

WELLES

They realize that we have in North Africa but one objective—the defeat of the Axis forces—which will bring with it the liberation of the people of France. During these first days, all arrangements which we may make with Frenchmen in North Africa are solely military in character, and are undertaken—properly—by the American and British military commanders. . . .

Would Clarify Goals

It seems to me that the first essential is the continuous and rapid perfecting of a relationship between the United Nations so that this military relationship may be further strengthened by the removal of all semblance of disunity or of suspicious rivalry, and by the clarification of the free-world goals for which we are fighting, and so that the form of international organization determined to be best suited to achieve international security will have developed to such an extent that it can fully operate as soon as the present military partnership has achieved its purpose of complete victory.

Another essential is the reaching of agreements between the United Nations before the armistice is signed upon those international adjustments, based upon the universal principles of the Nations Need To Be United From Inside

From Speech by the Hon. David Bowes-Lyon, head of British Political Warfare Mission in U. S.

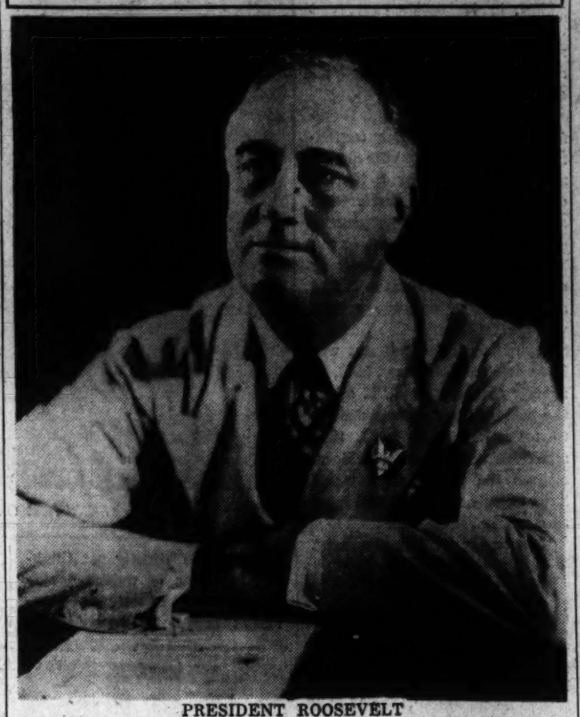
The first article in a creed for the New World of the United Nations is, therefore, that it shall be created by the peoples, and the second that it should be created in common effort among the peoples, working with the same community of purpose and intimate unity which the new inter-relationship of people to people makes possible.

A third article in the creed is that not only must the United Nations be united among themselves, but that each nation must be united within itself. I can best illustrate the type of unity that is necessary—and which is developing—by describing some features of contemporary Britain.

Anyone living there is aware of this new community of life in my country. It is not merely a temporary unity caused by the pressure of immediate danger from without. Our position in the front-line may have been one of the causes, but it is not a full explanation. Dunkirk—the victory of the little boats, the imminent threat of invasion and the establishment of our home guard; the Battle of Britain and the blitz on London and on our ports and cities, the long year in which we stood alone against the whole might of the German war-machine, the unceasing work of the Royal Navy and Merchant Marine which for so long alone had to keep open the sea routes—these were important factors in creating and sustaining the new unity in Britain.

It is precisely because this new vitality has a spiritual quality that it is so difficult to convey it in words.

Briefed highlights from speeches and messages read before the New York Herald Tribune Forum last week are presented on this page. They present a range of opinion from leaders of many Nations and reflect the way our "war thinking" is trending.



PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

President Says Turning Point In War Appears Now Reached

In a message to the Forum he said in part:

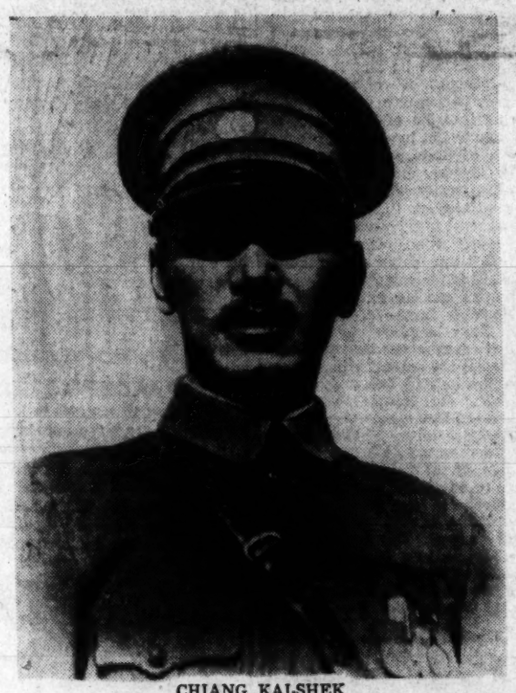
". . . The posters that tell you, 'Loose talk costs lives,' do not exaggerate. Loose talk delays victory. Loose talk is the damp that gets into powder. We prefer to keep our powder dry.

"We have a gigantic job to do—all of us, together. Our battle lines today stretch from Kiska to Murmansk, from Tunisia to Guadalcanal. These lines will grow longer, as our forces advance.

"We have had an uphill fight, and it will continue to be uphill all the way. There can be no coasting to victory.

"During the last two weeks we have had a great deal of good news, and it would seem that the turning point of this war has at last been reached. But this is no time for exultation. There is no time now for anything but fighting and working to win.

Chiang Appeals for Unity With Peace Enforced



CHIANG KAI-SHEK

By Generalissimo Chiang Kai-Shek

(Read by the Chinese Minister, Liu Chieh)

For many centuries Chinese society has been free of class distinctions such as are found in advanced democracies. At the core of our political thought is our traditional maxim, "The people form the foundation of the country." We Chinese are instinctively democratic, and Dr. Sun's objective of universal suffrage evokes from all Chinese a ready and unhesitating response. But the processes and forms by which the will of the people is made manifest, and the complex machinery of modern democratic government cannot, I know to my cost, be created overnight, especially under the constant menace and attack of Japanese militarism.

During the last years of his life Dr. Sun devoted much of his forward thinking to the economic reconstruction of China, and nothing, I believe, so marked his greatness as his insistence that the coming tremendous economic reconstruction of China should benefit not the privileged few but the entire nation.

The absence of a strong central government capable of directing economic development, the bondage of unequal treaties trying to keep China as a semi-colony for others, and above all the jealous machinations of Japan, all these greatly retarded the economic reconstruction to which the national revolution of China is dedicated.

But the end of the present war will find China freed of her bondage, with a vigorous government and a people ardent with desire to rebuild their country. I feel the force of this desire as a tidal wave which will not only absorb the energies of our people for a century but will also bring lasting benefits to the entire world.

But the bright promise of the future, which has done much to sustain us during our grim struggle with Japan, will cruelly vanish, if after paying the price this second time, we do not achieve the reality of world cooperation.

Among our friends there has been recently some talk of China emerging as the leader of Asia, as if China wished the mantle of an unworthy Japan to fall on her shoulders. Having herself been a victim of exploitation, China has infinite sympathy for the submerged nations of Asia and toward them China feels she has only responsibilities—not rights.

China has no desire to replace Western imperialism in Asia with an Oriental imperialism or isolationism of its own or of any one else.

Mrs. Ogden Reid, vice president of the Herald Tribune, presided at all sessions of the Forum which was in its tenth annual session. She told the delegates there was one word she wished could be removed from "the thinking now and in a postwar world." That word is "peace." "Actually," she said, "the state of peace arrives only with death."

MRS. REID

America Will Share Food With Many

From the address by Claude Wickard, Secretary of Agriculture.

The demand for our food increases steadily, most notably from Russia. Russia has won the world's admiration by her great stand against Hitler. In the fighting she has lost some of her richest agricultural areas. We have been sending food to Russia and her needs are mounting every day.

Perhaps some may wonder if we can supply our own military forces and also help feed many other nations. To them I answer, "Yes, if we can continue our past rate of production and if we save the food that is produced. Our motto for food should be: Produce and save." . . .

In the case of some of the foods needed so much overseas, we consumers here at home will have to tighten our belts. For instance, we are going to be short of beef for the next few months, even though our beef production is the largest on record. The reason is that we are supplying the boys in our Army who need a lot more beef than they did in civilian life.

We have been accumulating reserves of many other foods. We are doing this because we may meet unforeseen difficulties in production; because our growing Army and Navy will need more food, especially as they move on the offensive; because we must be ready to help feed new allies as their countries are liberated. I am sure you will agree that building those reserves is a second military policy. When it results—as it will—in changes in our eating habits, again I am sure, American consumers will accept those changes as matters of war-time necessity.

'Let Justice Be Our Aim' In Dealing With Enemies

By Queen Wilhelmina of the Netherlands

Read by Dr. H. G. Van Mook, Minister of Overseas Territory.

Without final victory planning for peace is useless—worse than useless, because it is apt to create the fatal illusion that winning the war will take care of itself, which it obviously will not.

But without forgetting that for a single moment, we also have to remember that if we do not thrust our mind and our will in time on the problems of peace, those problems will suddenly thrust themselves on us. Chaos would be the result and the beaten enemy would not be slow in taking advantage of it.

It would not be enough if only the governments took these important matters in hand. A well informed public opinion is indispensable.

Our aim, in a word, is the golden mean between private rights and the needs of the community. That is the very opposite of the retrograde—it is a perpetual process of adjustment as new conditions arise, a forward, progressive movement.

WILHELMINA

Specific Aims

Specific aims were set for the United Nations when your President . . . formulated the four freedoms which we seek to attain—freedom of speech, freedom of expression, freedom of worship and freedom from fear and want. We could all the more readily associate ourselves with these aims since, as I said in my address to Congress last summer, the Netherlands people had long approached—and to a large extent attained—the realization of these four freedoms.

Further amplification was given to our stated common purpose by the adoption of the Atlantic Charter by all the United Nations . . .

I hear much about machinery which will have to be set up to insure international security, to regulate exchanges, to direct the flow of goods and to raise the living standard throughout the world, especially in the countries hitherto less favored in that respect.

But it seems to me that another problem, so far left very much in the dark, is at least as important and probably even more important. The problem is: What is going to be done with the beaten enemies?

The thirst for revenge will be great and understandable. Let us not, however, let revenge be our guiding motive. Revenge is barren, except in that it breeds revenge. Let justice be our aim, justice and firmness tempered by wisdom.

Realism Urged For Countries Planning 'Peac

From a message broadcast to the Forum by Sir Stafford Cripps, Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons.

It will be your privilege and our privilege to work together to bring comfort, order and help to these vast tortured areas of the world. In that task we shall work with you, and to the utmost of our power we shall give help.

The quicker the ruin can be made good and the people relieved in their starvation, the sooner shall we all be able to set out upon that firm reconstruction of our international life, social, political and economic, which alone can justify the almost limitless suffering and sacrifice of the peoples.

We are, I am sure, each one of us, determined that out of this war must come a saner, safer and happier world, not in words but in actual fact. We must not be content with picturing a Utopia—we must create a better world.

Freedom is a wide word. As we have found in our national life, the liberty of each must be restrained to some extent for the greater liberty of all.

After this war we must devise better methods by which the freedom of nations can be preserved against brutal attack, not after the attack has been made by the long and painful trials of war but by preventive means before ever war can be launched.

To set out to build a world-wide economic federation of all nations would indeed be a glorious objective, provided we realize it is unattainable now and that it will probably remain so perhaps for generations. This is no reason why we should not aim toward some such distant goal so that each practical step which we take today may be in the right direction. . . .

Thousands of Super-Clippers Visioned for After War

By Juan T. Trippe

President, Pan American Airways System

AS OUR SHIPS sail again for the shores of Tripoli, every American has a deeper appreciation of the value of our merchant marine on the high seas in time of war. The spectacular cruisers make the Sunday supplements—but the transports land the men who make history.

So, also, when it comes to the ships of the air, it's the "Spitfires" and "Fortresses" that make front-page news. But it is our overseas air transports that do the unspectacular but vital trucking and hauling in the air.

Precisely how much, it might be asked, has America's civilian air transport contributed to the overseas war effort? To answer that question I have to speak first of the operations of the Pan American System because, at the outbreak of war, it was the only American overseas air transport system in existence.

Clippers have been providing fast airmail communications between the United Nations. They have been carrying with speed and security, thousands of Government officials and military staff officers on overseas missions important to the war effort.

Everyone realizes that spare parts and supplies have gone by air to our armed forces and to our Allies when surface transportation was too slow or unavailable. But, what many of us do not know is that our overseas merchant air fleet already is moving bulk cargo by air. Materials which cannot wait for surface transport, or which are so vital to our war economy that they cannot be entrusted to surface vessels because of the risk of loss, are being moved by air every day.

But the main job of air transportation overseas day after day, is, to get priority passengers, cargo and mail through in safety and on schedule. This is the job being done to help win the war by Pan American personnel in more than 60 foreign countries and colonies. At their stations on the ground and in the air, they are carrying on with ceaseless attention to every vital detail—as professionals should.

Right now, without further experiment, we can build here in the United States super-transports twice the size of our present ocean clippers. Although far more efficient aerodynamically than our present clippers, no new principle in design or construction is involved. Such transports can provide 24-hour service west from the United States to Chungking, China or Sydney, Australia; 10-hour service east from the United States to London, and continue without refueling, to Moscow or Cairo or Bagdad. Southward from the United States, they could provide 24-hour service to Rio and Buenos Aires.

Must Build More

A fleet of but 200 such super-transports could carry half a million people to Europe every month; or carry from Central India to embattled China ten times the cargo that ever moved over the Burma Road in its heyday. Two hundred such planes would be a small part of the present aircraft production of the United States. Such a fleet however, could contribute immeasurably to the successful prosecution of the war. In the words of President Roosevelt, "Civil aviation is the backlog of military aviation."

Every American wants our civil aviation to contribute most effectively to the war effort. Likewise, every American wants our civil aviation to be ready to meet its responsibilities in the post-war world. The United States is entitled to an overseas merchant air fleet second to none.

Such a merchant air fleet would also be the most effective medium for carrying out our share in the job of policing the postwar world—so that never again can a mere handful of aggressors run amuck.

Needed for Policing

An adequate merchant air fleet will constitute the most effective outlet for our great aircraft manufacturing plants — plants which must not be allowed to disintegrate when peace comes. It would constitute a medium for training the great corps of American airmen needed for overseas flying and at the same time familiarize them with world airways. It will constitute—again I quote President Roosevelt—"an effective backlog for military aviation." Our civil and military air fleets together will be a most important part of an international police force capable of seeing that no aggressors can again build an air fleet capable of challenging us or the rest of the world.

Without such an international police force we may live to see a third world war. We and other peace-loving nations will never again have a year or more to get ready as we did in the last World War and as we have had now. With airpower what it is today,

Basic Goals of World Peace Should Be Agreed Upon Now

By Wendell L. Willkie

The importance of the military in today's struggle is clear to us all. My concern tonight is with an even more powerful weapon than the gun, and that is the idea.

For, however important the role of bayonets and guns may have been in the development of mankind, the role of ideas has been vastly more important—and, in the long run, more conclusive. In historical times, at any rate, men have not often fought merely for the joy of killing each other. They have fought for a purpose. Sometimes that purpose has not been very inspiring. Sometimes it has been quite selfish. But a war won without a purpose is a war won without victory.

A most outstanding example of a war fought with a purpose was our own American Revolution. We did not fight the Revolution because we hated Englishmen and wanted to kill them, but because we loved freedom and wanted to establish it. I think it is fair to say, in the light of what that freedom has meant to the world, that the victory won at Yorktown was the greatest victory ever won by force of arms. But this was not because our army was large and formidable. It was because our purpose was so clear, so lofty and so well-defined.

Unhappily, this cannot be said of the first World War. It has become almost an historical truism that that was a war without victory. . . .

People Should Talk

Now I think that these considerations lead us inescapably to one conclusion. I think we must conclude that, generally speaking, nothing of importance can be won in peace which has not already been won in the war itself. I say nothing of importance. . . .

Can we not learn from this simple lesson, and from similar lessons of history, what our task is today? I say to you, we must learn. We must know that we shall win in the future peace only what we are now winning in the war—no more and no less.

It is the utmost folly—it is just short of suicide—to take the position that citizens of any country should hold their tongues for fear of causing distress to the immediate and sometimes tortuous policies of their leaders.

Shall we in America be quiet, for instance, when our leaders, after promising freedom to the French people, put into control over them the very man who has helped to enslave them?

Reality to Freedom

Thus, in order that we may win a real victory, we must encourage the utmost amount of discussion among ourselves and with our Allies. Moreover, we must be very clear as to what this word "allies" means. We have many allies—roughly, I should estimate them at a billion people. . . .

That, then, is our first problem—to discuss, and to discuss openly and frankly, the desires and needs of the Allied peoples so that we may all come into substantial agreement concerning what we are fighting for.

Our most immediate common need is, of course, a united military plan arrived at by a board of strategy representative not alone of the United States and Great Britain but representing likewise our other allies. Even such obviously essential cooperation has not yet been brought about. It is true we are beginning to work with the British.

Take a specific and difficult example of what lies before us if we are to give reality to those freedoms we have proclaimed. The Malayan Peninsula and the islands of the southeast Pacific are areas containing, among other things, the principal source of the rubber supply of the world. They are inhabited in part, at least, by unlettered and, in some instances, perhaps savage people. Those who sneer when it is suggested that freedom and self-government can be brought to all men feel that such areas must be ruled perpetually by some nation's colonial imperialism. Now assume that the Allies re-conquer those areas—shall we return them to their previous status, where their defense was courageous but inadequate and their peoples undeveloped under the governmental custody of some nation? Or shall they be wards of the United Nations, their basic commodities made freely available to the world, their safety protected by an international police force; the full yield of their resources used for their own health, their own education and development, and for their training—no matter how long it may take—in the practices of self-government? It is the principles upon which we shall base the solution of such problems that we must begin now to determine for ourselves . . .

Mrs. Morrow Sees Postwar Duty for Ladies

From the Address by Mrs. Dwight Morrow, Chairman of New York Women's Division of USO.

". . . This cooperation between women and the Army and Navy during the war leads logically to the idea of a service obligation to the country by girls after the war. It should be as natural, as axiomatic, as for the boys, and equal to theirs. We are noted as a country for wastefulness, but this great crisis in our history should teach us to save brains as well as gasoline. The work of volunteers alone prove how much potential strength is unused. Girls could have special training between high school and college, or possibly at summer school, and a women's reserve be built up something like the National Guard. I am surrounded by educational experts who could elaborate the point better than I can do. My thesis is that a nation that can train for war can train for peace.

Some are going to say, of course, "What of the American home?" Every fresh opportunity for women has been greeted as a threat at that institution. It is sturdy thought. It has withstood the shock of suffrage, higher education and economic independence for women, and I can't believe that national service now or later will shiver it to pieces. Rather I should think that women's war activities would enrich home life. The sum total of practical knowledge will be increased in the postwar world because more women will have worked at what are known as men's jobs. More interests in common should make for greater unity in the family and a better understanding between husbands and wives, mothers and sons, fathers and daughters.

More Commodity Rationing In Store for Americans

By James F. Byrnes

Director of Economic Stabilization

In time of war we must deal with hard realities. We have no time to theorize and play with words. Military men must discard their technical talk about principles of logistics, get down to brass tacks. They must discuss their problems in the language of the ordinary citizen, in terms of ships required to move troops and the food and ammunition which we must move to battle areas in order to enable the troops to fight.

Our first and chief problem is to consider how we are going to organize our civilian economy to win the war. We must consider the men we shall have to take out of civilian life in order to have the soldiers to fight.

In war time, price controls, wage controls and rationing controls are not ingenious devices to punish people and to make the grim business of war grimmer than it need be.

War-time controls, however carefully devised and administered, will bear more severely on some than on others. That is inevitable, just as it is inevitable that some of our soldiers will make the supreme sacrifice while others will return unharmed and wrapped in glory . . .

From what I have said, it is clear that we must ration many more commodities. But, before a commodity is rationed, we must be careful to let the people know the facts upon which we base the decision that rationing is necessary. And we must be careful to see that there are no conflicting statements by responsible officials of government as to the necessity.

Postwar Occupation Plans Revealed for United States

By Maj. Gen. Allen W. Gullion

From speech by Maj. Gen. Allen W. Gullion, Provost Marshal General of U. S. Army.

Despite the inevitable obligation of the Army to establish and maintain military government in an occupied area, it is sometimes said that military government and imperialism are practically indistinguishable. This is error—provided that military government is discontinued as it should be when military necessity no longer requires it . . .

It is the duty of the occupying authority, whether military or civilian, to preserve so far as possible the local institutions, laws and customs of the occupied region. Military government and the succeeding civilian authority are, therefore, in a sense superimposed upon the existing local structure and seek to shape the latter to the military and political exigencies of the occupation. Hence, if the job is to be well done those charged with its execution must have a knowledge of the institutions, customs, economy and psychology of the occupied area and must also be prepared to supervise or to function throughout the entire field of public administration. This is a most complicated undertaking, calling for a large number of professional skills. . . .

The experts, to perform these missions, must also be indoctrinated in the backgrounds of the special areas in which they operate. . . .

Let me indicate very briefly what is now being done. Last May, the Army established at the University of Virginia a school of military government

Darlan's Aid Still Is Invaluable To Success in North Africa

By Marshall Andrews
Post Staff Writer

By the timely manipulation of ambition and hate an American soldier has won in North Africa what is probably the cheapest military success in history.

Yet, in a way, that success has been costly. Much of the hate in which we have dabbled inevitably has clung to us; the ambition we have bent to our ends has entangled us in a web where more hate will be bred before we're out of it.

Our success in North Africa was cheap because Admiral Jean Darlan, who hates the Germans, hates the British and hates Pierre Laval, decided to help us make it cheap. How much Darlan's aid will cost us in bitterness, suspicion and eroding discontent at home and among our Allies is yet to be seen.

A large and vociferous element of our own people has denounced the deal with Darlan without qualification.

London dispatches have smoked with denunciation of Darlan and all he has stood for.

The Free French, whose own ambitions as well as whose hopes are cast all awry by our use of Darlan as an ally, have accepted him with bitterness and suspicion.

Only the Russians, whose hatred of Facism is classic, have had nothing to say about the matter. The Russians are supreme realists.

Darlan Aid Needed

It is now evident beyond question that the assistance of Darlan in the American occupation of the North African coast was a veritable godsend, unexpected as it was valuable. And Darlan's usefulness is not yet ended. Upon retention of his aid may depend whether the Allies can go straight ahead to use North Africa as a base of operations against the Axis southern flank or whether many months and many lives must be spent in making our position there secure.

You no doubt remember the heroic exploit of Lieut. Gen. Mark W. Clark and a party of United States and British officers who made a precarious submarine journey to North Africa to pave the way for the occupation. They spent much money there and they won over as an ally Gen. Henri Giraud, who defied the Germans in two wars by escaping from their prisons and who was a popular hero in France.

Much depended upon the assistance of Giraud. He was to appeal to the French in North Africa to throw in their lot with the Allies and thus end armed resistance to American landings. By Giraud's aid an operation ordinarily costly beyond measure was to be made cheap.

But it did not work out that way. Giraud appealed by radio to the French people but they would not heed him. Popular he might be, but he represented no fragment of constituted authority and the formal and orderly French were not stirred by his appeal.

Hate Was Mutual

By the merest freak of chance Darlan was in Algiers when an American column forced its way past the harbor forts and drove into the city. He had gone there to visit his son, ill with infantile paralysis in an Algerian hospital. And Darlan was a member of the Vichy cabinet. He represented what government France had. He was Marshal Petain's legally constituted successor under what then passed for law in France. Swallowed up by the American column, Darlan emerged within a few hours in an unexpected and, to many, startling role. As an ally of the Allies, against whom he long had fulminated and worked all the horrors of a Nazi-bred inquisition, he could halt resistance to the African occupation and he did. Thousands of American lives were saved by his intervention and millions of dollars and incalculable days of priceless time.

Why Darlan deserted Vichy to join the Allies, among whom were the British whom he hated and the Free French with whom hate was deadly and mutual, only a few men know today. There are several possibilities:

Darlan was ambitious, say those who have known him, so fervently ambitious that nothing was permitted to stand in the way of his ambition, not honor nor country nor kinship. And Darlan hated Pierre Laval, whose equally hot ambition stood in the way of his own.

Darlan was an opportunist, making use of Vichy while Vichy stood, switching his allegiance without a qualm when opportunity seemed to ride the Allied banners.

Darlan was bought by an immense sum of money.

Darlan was (and this is the most charitable view of all) anti-British, but he also was anti-Nazi and pro-French.

In Free French circles, where resentment of the marriage with Lavel smolders most fiercely, all these possibilities are discarded except the first two and they are made all of a pattern.

In the first place, say the Free French, money means little to Darlan who has plenty of his own, though an Allied victory probably would better his chances of keeping it. As for his loyalty to France, that is dismissed with the observation that while he was in power at Vichy he caused hundreds of his countrymen to be seized and turned over as hostages to the Nazis, who subsequently murdered many of them.

No, the Free French insist, Darlan's ambition and his opportunism are the answers to his reversal of allegiance and he will shift again and undo all he has done should that move seem favorable. They were surprised and shocked by the deal with Darlan and they make no secret of their feelings.

Free French Anxious

Last Tuesday President Roosevest said flatly that the Darlan alliance was "only a temporary military expedient" justified in that it saved American, British and French lives, avoided loss of time in mopping up and permitted the offensive to roll unvexed into Tunisia. And he said "I have accepted General Eisenhower's political arrangements made for the time being," a statement which left no doubt that the Darlan deal surprised him as much as anyone else and that he did not consider it permanently binding.

These assurances the Free French perforce had to accept. But despite them, the Free French liked the deal no better than before, which was not at all. Any collaboration with any element of the Vichy government was a threat to their own plans for post-war France. And on top of that they saw in this arrangement a difficulty in the way of their hopes for a unified France under their leadership from North Africa.

It is further to be remembered that the Free French are thinking beyond the war as are the people of all nations now involved in it. They see in a France fighting side by side with her allies a France which will take its place at the peace table on equal terms with her allies. In a France dismembered to the end, its territory occupied and its leadership divided, they see a nation which, when peace is made, will speak with too small a voice to be heard.

For that reason the Free French were desperately anxious that the Allied occupation of north Africa be under their auspices and with their aid. As things have turned out, they fear they will find themselves in the position this country might face should it end a war with most of the west in the hands of the Japanese, most of the east occupied by Germany and the balance held by friendly British and French. It is not for them a bright outlook.

Yet, as things developed, there was nothing the Free French could do to help themselves. Their leader in North Africa, Gen. Charles De Gaulle, was a general of division, whose orders would not have been heeded by the three French generals in control there for Vichy, all of whom outranked him. General Giraud, acceptable to them and of sufficient rank, nevertheless proved unacceptable to the commanders there because, like De Gaulle, he represented no authority they recognized. Every card they held was trumped.

But there in Algiers, in American hands, was Jean Darlan, member of the Vichy cabinet and head of all the armed forces of Vichy France. He turned out to be an ace dealt from from a cold deck. However it was done, General Eisenhower accomplished a bit of "military expediency" at which those whose first interest is in winning this war will rejoice.

What this "military expedient" counted for in the war effort may be measured in solid coin. In North Africa when American forces landed were some 120,000 troops, the excellent mercenaries of the Foreign Legion and native Algerian, Moroccan and Senegalese volunteers led by French officers. All of its air force saved by France after the disaster of 1940, some 650 or 700 fighters and trainers, were there with pilots. At Dakar, Casablanca, Oran, Algiers, Bizerte, Alexandria, were warships of the French fleet with officers and crews.

Without Darlan's aid, the occupying forces probably would have had to fight their way inshore mile by mile, at a cost in casualties which has been averted.

After the occupation was completed, troops would have been needed to garrison the French outposts, a detail now occupying probably 70,000 French troops in North Africa.

The French air force would have made itself at least a nuisance, despite the obsolescene of its airplanes.

What French warships were in commission would no doubt have fought as stubbornly as did those off Casablanca.

Those things were what the expediency of enlisting Darlan as an ally averted and for that the soldierly promptness of Eisenhower to use whatever weapon lay at hand to gain his ends must be gratefully acknowledged. Yet the task is by no means ended and Darlan's cooperation is as necessary now as before.

Fleet Not Free

As well as can be determined, Allied forces have not penetrated beyond the coastal fringe. Dakar is still in Vichy hands and the fleet is not yet free of Vichy control.

What will be the attitude of the outpost garrisons is not yet known. They may continue to guard French territory as before or they may set up isolated centers of resistance to Allied control. Darlan, no doubt, is the key to their loyalty. And some of them are important, such as those along the Riff which command the road between Algeria and Morocco.

Where Dakar will fall may depend entirely upon Darlan. French forces there are commanded by Gen. Pierre Boisson, pro-German, pro-Vichy and, fortunately, pro-Darlan. Reports have been published that a commission was on its way from Dakar to negotiate with Eisenhower. Darlan's word may make the commission's decision.

Darlan's value to the Allies grew in large part from the fact that Vichy adherents had been placed in all posts of command in North Africa but one. Boisson was at Dakar, Gen. August Nogues at Casablanca and Gen. Alphonse Juin in command of Oran and Algiers. Nogues acceded at once to Darlan's order to cease resistance to American occupation. Juin was quite another matter.

This officer had been captured during the Battle of France and had been released on his personal pledge that he would not again fight against Germany in this war. Accordingly, he has disappeared from the scene and Darlan himself has taken command in Algeria and carried out his own policy of cooperation with the Allies.

Disposition of the French fleet remains puzzling. It is notable that Darlan did not order the fleet to join the Allies as he did the army; he "asked" it to join. The results of this are obscure at the moment, though not beyond plausible speculation.

Darlan's request was countermanded by an order from Petain.

Germans may have been on board those vessels in Toulon harbor, by far the major portion of the fleet.

The vessels may have been out of fuel and their bottoms badly fouled by two years of idleness at anchor.

Most officers of the fleet, whose attitude would determine its disposition, had families in French territory occupied by the Nazis and feared reprisals.

The Free French say no to all those speculations and advance a reason of their own for the inactivity of the fleet. Germans have not taken over the vessels, they contend, because a zone has been established 30 miles around Toulon in which no German nor Italian troops are permitted. The vessels are neither out of fuel nor badly fouled because they have been used during the last two years in frequent convoys to French ports in North Africa. Reprisals need not be feared because no reprisals have been visited on families of officers in the Free French forces and Free French prisoners have been treated as well as any others.

The reason, the Free French say, lies in the character of the French naval officers. They describe these officers as members of the aristocratic caste, the remnants of nobility, whose personal interests lie directly opposite to those of exponents of republican government; in fascism is their only hope of returning their caste to its former power.

As for the fleet elements at Dakar and under British domination at Alexandria and United States domination at Martinique, their commanders are practically free agents. They need take no action one way or the other until they can see clearly which side will win; then they can join the winners if feasible or lie quiet until the war is over.

As far as the occupation of North Africa itself was concerned, the aid of Darlan was invaluable. To extend Allied control there and make the Allied position secure, his assistance still is needed.

The United States, President Roosevelt has said, has no intention of setting up Darlan as the future ruler of France. The government of liberated France, he declared, "will be established not by any individual in metropolitan France or overseas but by the French people themselves after they have been set free by the victory of the United Nations."

Still the Free French are bitterly opposed to Darlan's position of authority, temporary and expedient though it may be. Representatives of the De Gaullist movement called on the President Friday, conferred with him 20 minutes and left the White House muttering that despite all assurances "the situation is most certainly peculiar and very dangerous."

They were reminded that under General Eisenhower's control Nazi-inspired anti-semitic laws were being junked in North Africa and prewar liberties restored, though Darlan heads his French North African commission. They do not like the trend away from the plans for France for which they have fought during two years of knuckling to Germany by Darlan and his Vichy associates.

In spite of all that has been done in North Africa, they warn, the "myth of Petain" is still the guiding power there.

The United States has used the old hates and the fresh ambitions of Europe to attain its own aims, unselfish and altruistic though they may be. So far those aims have been accomplished magnificently.

Hate and ambition may taint by their very nature the fine thing that has been done if people forget there's a war to be won.

Admiral Jean Darlan who issued the cease-firing orders to the French is now a controversial figure in the European situation

THE GALLUP POLL

Rumors Continue All Over Country

By George Gallup
Director, American Institute of Public Opinion

Princeton, N. J., Nov. 21.—Rumors, which give aid to the enemy by confusing the public, are for the first time in the present war being made the subject of scientific study and analysis.

Pioneers in the work of covering and scotching all kinds of false rumors are Gordon Allport and Robert Knapp of Harvard University.

The American Institute of Public Opinion, with its Nation-wide staff of field reporters, is in a position not only to discover rumors, but also to measure the extent and speed with which they travel across the Nation.

The results of a study just completed are an astounding collection of baseless stories or distortions of the truth running from the vicious to the plain ridiculous.

Those which contain a grain of the truth are perhaps more harmful than the others, since they are more apt to be believed. For example, here is what happened to part of President Roosevelt's report to the Nation on October 11. He said at one point in his talk:

"... I was impressed by the large proportion of women employed ... I had some enlightening experiences relating to the old saying of us men that curiosity—inquisitiveness—is stronger among women. I noticed that, frequently, when we drove unannounced down the middle of the great plant full of workers and machines, the first people to look up from their work were the men—and not the women."

The rumor, reported from a small Indiana town, went like this:

"Roosevelt has lost so much popularity that when he went into the war factories, the women didn't even bother to look up at him, but kept right on working."

Roosevelt Rumors Rank High

Leon Henderson will probably be surprised to learn of this one, a distortion of the fact that the metals used in making and trimming burial caskets are badly needed in the war effort:

In a Wisconsin town, Henderson is reported to have said, "All the undertakers have to do is wrap the body in a sheet and put it in the ground. That's sufficient."

Stories as ridiculous as the one about Henderson would be more amusing were it not for the fact that they are apparently believed by the more credulous.

Listed below are the subjects of the hundreds of rumors collected, with the relative frequency with which they are mentioned:

Anti-Roosevelt, 15 per cent; anti-Administration, 14 per cent; anti-business (industrial waste and profiteering), 12 per cent; (armed forces, 11 per cent); Red Cross, 7 per cent; anti-British, 8 per cent; anti-Semitic, 6 per cent; Fifth Column activity, 6 per cent; unrevealed enemy activity, 5 per cent; anti-Negro, 3 per cent; labor, 1 per cent; Russia, 1 per cent; all others, 11 per cent.

President Roosevelt comes in for a considerable amount of attention. No rumors about him, however, have been so persistent as those concerning his health, although the White House physician and the press have constantly pointed to his amazing energy.

So it was when he made his recent swing through the Northwest, people immediately ascribed it to a trip to the Mayo Brothers Clinic for health purposes.

Other rumors, still more ridiculous about Roosevelt are that he is buying up a lot of caskets because he intends killing a lot of people in the country very soon; that he plans to distribute soon all of the world's gold to the American people, but meanwhile has it buried in the ground somewhere; that he got Wendell Willkie to oppose him in 1940 and paid all of his campaign expenses.

Talk Varies by Sections

The Red Cross is unfortunately being victimized by a series of malicious rumors. From almost every State in the country have come reports that the Red Cross is profiteering on donated cigarettes, blood, socks and sweaters.

One rumor about the Red Cross being passed around with solemnity in one section is as follows: "The Red Coss is accepting blood donations from Japanese, and such blood is mixed with that of American donors. Such a practice is terrible to contemplate because offspring of Americans receiving this blood stand a good chance of showing Japanese characteristics."

The Red Cross has had difficulty with a similar rumor concerning blood donated by Negroes.

The facts are, of course, that physicians will tell you that there is no scientific basis whatsoever for conclusions that mixture of plasma has any such effect. Meanwhile, however, blood donations are under Army and Navy orders identified and the plasma for marked groups is kept for use in aiding these groups.

Another interesting fact revealed in the Institute study is that various rumors are particularly common in certain sections of the country. On the West Coast, war profiteering rumors are rife, in the South, rumors about the Negro, in the North Central sections, rumors about the Jews.

Some of the rumors are fantastic. From Pueblo, Colo., which is remote from either coast, word came of this one: "Pueblo is the seventh city on the list for bombing and will get bombed in January, 1943."

If another type of rumor were true, bakers and theaters along our coasts would be doing a tremendous business with German submarine personnel. From Maine to Florida sailors said to have been captured from German submarines are reported to have in their possession bread baked in Boston, or Baltimore or Jacksonville, or theater ticket stubs from these cities.

A rumor with currency in New Hampshire is that Roosevelt put gasoline rationing into effect just to take revenge upon all of his Republican enemies.

While the Government has asked the American public not to pass along rumors without checking them and not to pass along false rumors which might endanger public morale, evidence at hand would indicate that the public needs a great deal more education on this point.

M. Laval

M. Pierre Laval is, as the saying goes, out on a limb and no one knows it better than he. At this late date there is no other line for him to take than the one taken in the speech broadcast the other day from Vichy. Both his political life and his physical life now hang upon the slender hope of an Axis victory—a victory which two years ago seemed to him, and to so many others, so certain, but which has now been placed in the category of highly improbable events. M. Laval, the master of political intrigue, has thus found himself enmeshed in his own devious policy.

It may well be that M. Laval, who under the parliamentary dispensation was so often able to outfox his political opponents, believed himself capable in the long run of outfoxing his German masters, of whose cerebral capacities he shares the contemptuous opinion of most of his countrymen. But he has discovered too late that the German overlordship of Europe is not necessarily permanent. When he came to realize that a new wind was blowing he did his best to retrieve his mistakes. He made overtures, it is said, to Herriot and the other irreconcilable French Republicans only to be haughtily rebuffed. His policy and personality had become so deeply identified with the cause of the Nazis that retreat was impossible. And so there is nothing left for this Pantaloon, who fancied himself an Odysseus or a Machiavelli, but to play his farce to the bitter end—and bitter it will certainly be.

No Time For Patchwork

President Roosevelt's decision to effect a reorganization of manpower controls is one of the best pieces of news that has come out of the White House in recent weeks. We are at the beginning of a period in which systematic regulation of manpower will be imperative if we are to attain a maximum war effort. Shortages of labor in some fields have already become acute. Increasing demands of the Army, Navy and war industries will leave the country no reasonable alternative to the careful placement of each individual where his services can count most effectively toward a United Nations victory. And to date we have neither a national service policy nor an organization capable of carrying out such a policy.

The need for decisive action is recognized by everyone who is familiar with the present muddle. The only questions left open to discussion are the form which the new setup should take and the authority to be given to it. President Roosevelt will be under strong pressure to reshuffle the existing conglomeration of manpower agencies and to adopt a makeshift policy that will again have to be modified a few months hence. We hope that he will resist that pressure, that he will go as far as possible toward consolidation of manpower controls under one competent agency, and that he will then support legislation giving that agency enough power to carry out its all-important work.

Failure of the War Manpower Commission's "freezing" order in the copper mining industry to increase production points to the absolute necessity of unifying manpower controls. Loss of copper production may be a prelude to loss of battles. It is patently absurd to leave the supply of copper miners to the haphazard forces of competition for labor and to the variable judgment of local draft boards. What we need is one single manpower agency that can shift men into the Army, the Navy or any war industry where their services are in greatest demand from the viewpoint of our national interest.

No mere patching of the existing hodgepodge system is likely to achieve that result. It is true that the War Manpower Commission is now setting up regional offices and strengthening its staff. Plant inspectors are soon to be employed to check labor hoarding and facilitate the voluntary placement of men where the most acute shortages exist. But in part this work will duplicate what is now being done by several other agencies. A wholesale reorganization is needed to end the confusion and stop the flagrant waste of manpower within the Government itself. It goes without saying that such a new manpower agency will have to be closely tied in with the WPB and the Office of Economic Stabilization if confusion is to be eliminated instead of being merely transferred to a higher level.

It appears obvious, too, that legislation will be needed if the new manpower agency is to get started off on the right foot. Persuasion alone will not suffice in the midst of global warfare. The new manpower chief must have authority to direct men to serve where they can be most useful. In practice that power would seldom have to be used, but its absence would leave the proposed new agency almost as helpless as the WMC has been. And even the most competent organization left without authority to carry out its assignment may be discredited in the public mind before it has a chance to prove its worth. The time for halfway measures has long since passed. Temporizing with this grave problem at this late hour would be no less dangerous than timid and uncertain leadership on the battlefield.

Aggressive Spirit

Fuller details of our magnificent naval victory in the Solomons will no doubt yield many lessons for the technical experts. Some of those lessons, perhaps, may involve much unlearning. For instance, the "lesson" drawn from the Battle of the Coral Sea that never again would fleets close to gun range has been completely upset. In the Solomons it was a slugfest throughout. Likewise there will be reappraisals in the carrier-versus-battleship controversy. Here we had as old-fashioned a naval encounter as Trafalgar was, in spite of the concurrent use of air-power. The traditionally minded, consequently, will be confirmed in their faith in the battleship. And they will get additional support for their standpattism from Admiral Halsey's defense of the "elephant" of the high seas. "The carrier is the great offensive weapon," said the hero of the Solomons, "but the battleship still retains its role, and will continue to play a decisive part in the Pacific warfare."

We may leave these arguments to the experts, at least till full data about the naval fray come from the Solomons. But in the meantime there is one lesson already available from the Solomons, and it is one which will not be fought over. That is that the aggressive spirit is the decisive factor in modern as in ancient warfare. With that spirit Admiral Halsey won the Battle of the Solomons. Admiral Callaghan had it, too, and the gallant officers and men who gave their lives in this grand clash with the Japanese fleet. But if we single out Admiral Halsey, it is because the display of the aggressive spirit in the supreme command is of singular influence. Bernard Brodie, in a new book, "A Layman's Guide to Naval Strategy," contrasts the Army and the Navy in this respect. It is often said that an army is as brave as its privates and as good as its generals. But in a navy the admirals determine the bravery as well as the merit of the whole force, for the admiral of a fleet or the captain of a ship shares the hazard of battle equally with the lowest rating. He is in front, not behind; and the men back of him have to follow. His example must therefore suffuse the behavior of the entire ship or fleet, whether for good or ill.

Accordingly a crew will fight as if inspired if it is led by an aggressive captain. An example is the light cruiser Boise. This 10,000-ton craft docked at Philadelphia on Thursday after sinking six Japanese warships in an isolated 27-minute battle off the Solomons in October. With Capt. E. J. Moran on the bridge, she came in bruised and battered and without 107 of her crew who were killed in action. Admiral King was present when the Boise docked, and it was a graceful and well-deserved gesture. For Captain Moran is in a tradition in American naval history which goes back to John Paul Jones and the Bonhomme. Jones, with a motley crew and a converted merchantman, fought the British frigate Serapis to the point of surrender. It was such an unequal match that the British skipper was court-martialed. This was his testimony to John Paul Jones: "Long before the close of the action it became apparent that the American ship was dominated by a commanding will of a most unalterable resolution." The same tribute could be attached to Captain Moran.

On a bigger scale Admiral Halsey displayed the "commanding will of the most unalterable resolution." It could not be denied. Caution is apt to be bred by the peacetime practice of elevating officers who are careful with their charges. It was feared at one time that this caution could not be thrown overboard in action. And, to be sure, some naval engagements in the war in the Pacific have been lost by conservatism. But the exploit of Halsey will serve as an example of what the aggressive spirit can do to bridge gaps in relative strength in men and ships. We have need of that spirit till we catch up to the Japanese. We shall have need of it even when we can match them ship for ship in the Pacific.

Railway Labor Demands

Representatives of the Big Five operating rail unions will assemble shortly in Chicago preparatory, it is reported, to demanding wage increases for their members. The nonoperating unions demanded wage increases that would add an estimated 450 million dollars to carrier wage bills nearly two months ago. So the railroads are in the position of a convalescent who, on rising from his sick bed, receives a shock that may prevent a sound and lasting recovery.

Apart from any question of the ability of the carriers to pay, moreover, there are two excellent arguments against meeting any further demands for rail-wage increases. The first is that such increases would add fuel to the inflationary fires the Government is trying so hard to keep down. The second is that the railway workers have already secured wage increases that have raised their remuneration to record heights. By 1940 the average annual earnings of operating employes had recovered all that was lost in the depression years and were somewhat above the 1929 level. Meantime average hourly earnings had risen, along with a decline in the working week, between 20 and 30 per cent for engineers, conductors, firemen, brakemen and flagmen in passenger and through-freight service. For the nonoperating employes increases in annual pay between 1929 and 1940 ranged from slightly over 4 per cent to close to 15 per cent. Since these computations were made, wage increases totaling approximately 300 million dollars have been granted to operating and nonoperating employes.

These gains were made, it should be remembered, during a period of deep depression that threw a large proportion of the country's railway system into bankruptcy. The current improvement in earnings as a result of the abnormal conditions of wartime has, it is true, temporarily relieved the distress of the railways. But it has not provided a permanent solution of their problems. In the long run the rail unions will benefit by permitting the roads to strengthen their financial position in preparation for postwar adjustments.

The policy of pushing wages upward regardless of the ability of the carriers to pay has been short-sighted and detrimental to labor itself. For demands for higher wages have been accompanied in the past by drastic reductions in employment to hold down labor costs. It has been frequently pointed out that a prosperous railway system constitutes the only sure basis for stabilized employment conditions. But prosperity will never be assured unless the roads are left with some surplus in good years to cover the deficiencies of bad times.

Night Fighting

One of the phenomena about our war with Japan is that many of the engagements take place under cover of darkness. The naval battle of the Solomons which we have just won was mainly fought in the night hours. So was the battle of Java last spring. All through their capture of the islands of Indonesia and Oceania, as a matter of fact, the Japanese used their warships at night, and hid under cover of the islands in the daytime. Again the Japanese assault on our naval forces protecting our invasion of Guadalcanal was made at night. Even in land operations the Japanese prefer night fighting. After sundown they are apt to swarm up to the ridges which form our natural front at Guadalcanal and mix in with our Marines. Seldom is there any trouble in the daytime.

The major reason, of course, is the airplane. Wherever there have been naval encounters in the daytime, ship-to-ship fighting has been almost impossible, as at Coral Sea and Midway. Ships seemingly cannot come close enough when planes are available. Actually the American victory at Midway was sometimes called the greatest naval victory ever won by airmen. Accordingly the side which does not enjoy air superiority will naturally choose—if it has a choice—the hours when planes can be least effective. In that case, moreover, it may also enjoy the immense advantage of surprise, as happened when the Japanese scored from our screening force during the landing at Guadalcanal. In that engagement the Japanese crept up to our Guadalcanal naval force after midnight without detection. Then they turned night into day by sending up flares and then picking off our ships by searchlight.

On both sides, evidently, there has been some misunderstanding as to the other's ability to cope with night fighting. One of the illusions of many Navy men was that the Japanese Navy did not like the darkness. That has not been the case. To be sure, the Japanese at the end of the recent Battle of the Solomons began to fire mistakenly on each other. But that was not fear of darkness, but the result of confusion over Admiral Halsey's tactics. It is not an unusual happening after a surprise night attack.

Similarly on Guadalcanal the zero hour of attack—always, in World War I, in the dim hours of the morning—seems to have been fixed during darkness in part because of the Japanese feeling that the absence of light would play on our troops' nerves. At any rate, they seek to make the atmosphere blood-curdling. The battle-cry is "American Marine, you die!" But the Marines appear to enjoy the opportunity of vocal accompaniment to action, and the answer goes back in much the same phraseology, with a few cuss words thrown in and an additional promise that tonight will be the night. That the Marines are keeping their word is the testimony of the 10-to-1 casualty record. In night fighting we seem to hold the edge at sea as well, as the Battle of the Solomons bears witness. In that battle this country reaped the advantage of the stress on gunnery which always has distinguished Navy training.

AUTUMN IN ARCADY

We knew the thin gold-pieces that we found
Strewn everywhere about us, on that day,
Through the bright wood, over the dark, dank ground,
Were those wherewith the summer paid her way;
Indeed, what shining good was ever had
But must be paid for, and in full, in season? . . .
And having said so, we were suddenly sad,
And longer silent—and for no good reason,

Save that, for once we knew the cold unease
Of the earth's favored whose swet lot must bear
In its own sweetness, the slow, dread disease
Of fear of envious heaven, of the air,
Of aimed, invisible arrows, of the law
We saw about us in the leaves we saw.

War Effort Day

While there are millions of Americans in our armed forces, and additional millions in our war work, there are great numbers of people who yearn to do something that can be called a help to their country. The idea back of this preamble is to establish the day of December 7 as a National War Effort Day for everyone not now in the armed forces or engaged in war work, and let everyone do what he can and what he feels will be a help to the war effort.

For instance, there are many able-bodied men, such as real estate men, insurance men, clerks of all sorts, who I am sure would be willing to spend that one day helping the farmer gather in crops rather than let them rot on the ground which they are necessarily having to do because the farmers are not in a position to get the needed help to gather the crops into the barn and hence to town. There are thousands of older people to collect scrap such as steel, rubber, etc.

In other words, men can devote their services gratis to other men who might have a job too large for them to handle individually. Men might lend themselves to the things that it is their custom to say, "Somebody else will probably do it; I will find something else." Nothing is too small for an individual man to do, and nothing is too large for a group of men to control. Working together, our people can surmount any dream or thought that the wildest imagination could conjure.

To my mind, this would really be a step forward in making the Nation realize that we are all one, and nothing more than the weakest one among us. I am sure the psychological effect of 130 million people working in a unified effort for just 1 day of 8 hours—which is 1,040,000,000 man-hours of work—would have an appalling effect upon the arch enemies of democracy.

Beautify Ugly Cities

Now that the excitement attendant upon the recent metal scrap drive has somewhat subsided, may I on behalf of our country advance a proposal that has been in mind for years.

The writer's activities demand that he travel extensively throughout these United States, a lovely country whose face is blemished with unnecessarily ugly cities. The latter statement is justified when one takes into consideration the succession of sprawling junk yards and dumps, that greet the eye on entering either by rail or highway, most of our cities and towns, giving, besides an offensive sight, the impression of extreme civic inefficiency and indifference, as well as slovenliness.

The remedy I suggest to eradicate this unsightliness is, that a certain area be set apart near towns and cities, preferably where there is a small gully or depression available, where all refuse metal, abandoned autos, etc., could be disposed of by the community. Said area to be under the supervision of the local mayor and police department, or, why not the Boy Scouts?

The plan envisaging as it does the elimination of all such eyesores, etc., the area so set aside, can be surrounded with quick-growing poplar trees or other plant life of suitable screening value.

Aircraft Unity

Unfortunate at this time are newspaper reports to the effect that the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce of America, Inc., the trade association of the aviation manufacturing industry, is threatened with dissolution as the result of a controversy among its members over what are said to be certain rulings made by the board.

This news is unfortunate at any time but especially now when there should be unity of purpose and thought among members of the aircraft manufacturing industry who are affiliated with this trade association. If the matters which the members seem to object to are arbitrary they should be amended to fit the universal need. This is no time to dissolve a trade group which is vitally needed now and after the war for carrying on the achievements accomplished in war production and on the line by the men who have faith in flying.

There is a great future for the aircraft industry, wherever it is located, north, east, west, or south, and through unity and cooperation of all concerned, there can be greater achievement. If a house is divided, the walls will fall, and so will the achievements of the past. In unity there is strength. Let's have it.

A Just Peace

One of your correspondents declares that a negotiated peace is bargaining for another war, that "to dictate peace is to secure peace," that "Germany must be disarmed," and finally he says, "Let us learn from history." Now, ironically, if we are to learn from history, then we must absolutely not do everything he insists upon.

In 1918 we absolutely refused to negotiate a peace. We insisted upon dictating it unconditionally, and we did. And the dictated peace to end all wars led to this war, much worse than the other by the fact that two of our chief Allies in the last war, Italy and Japan, are this time on the German side. That is the price of a dictated peace. A negotiated peace would never have led to the injustices that drove even two of our former Allies against us.

Then he says Germany must be disarmed. But again the history he invokes tells us that Germany was disarmed in 1918 and kept disarmed for 15 years.

No, if history is to be invoked then we ought to try justice this time in our peace treaty—real, honest justice. If other nations are to have armies, Germany must be allowed to have them. If England and America may have colonies and raw materials in all parts of the world, Germany must be accorded the same rights. And if Danzig is a German city more than a Polish one, then she must be given Danzig. A dictated unjust peace has failed once, let's try justice this time.

Penalizing Federal Emplo

One of the most discriminatory laws on the statute books is the provision contained in section 30 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1935, Public Law 141, Seventy-third Congress, approved March 28, 1934, which provides that a disabled veteran in Federal employ shall not receive more than $6 per month disability compensation, if his salary exceeds $1000 and, if married, $2500.

Why the Congress should penalize a disabled veteran who is employed by the Government by making him forfeit all his disability compensation except $6 is hard to understand. He is permitted to work for a private concern and receive a salary up to $25,000 and still receive his disability compensation, but the minute he starts working for the Government and makes over $1000 if single, he must practically forfeit all his compensation. This $1000 if single and $2500 if married restriction is ridiculous. I doubt if there is a single veteran in the Government service today making less than 1000, especially when it is noted that messengers are paid $1320. As for married veterans making over $2500, these are for the most part, those who started at a low salary and after many years service have finally worked themselves up to where they are receiving $2500. Then for their long faithful service they are penalized by an appreciative Congress by having their disability compensation cut to $6.

This law penalizes a disabled veteran to such an extent that it amounts to a practical bar to Government employment. A veteran who fought at Chateau Thierry or the Solomons, or elsewhere, and is disabled to a degree of 40 to 50 per cent is already handicapped enough, without further being penalized if he seeks work in the Government service by being compelled to forfeit his disability compensation, a compensation rightfully due him for injuries received in battle at the risk of his life. This obnoxious law has been on the statute books too long already and should be immediately wiped out.

Lengthening Hours

I understand the Senate will attempt to lengthen the work week of Federal employes to 48 hours before overtime may begin.

The taxpayers are going to pay for this work, certainly, but they should not be encouraged into believing that certain classes of people should receive more for doing warwork than others. Organized labor works by the hour and receives pay for every single hour worked. Industries handling war production contracts receive specified amounts, and would not dream of producing extra goods without receiving extra compensation.

The popular argument for turning the white collar worker into a slave is, of course, "men in the service are on duty 24 hours a day, no overtime paid." It must be remembered that all men of certain ages are subject to draft, and working for a small salary today will not save them becoming soldiers tomorrow, if their numbers are called.

Also, we should strive to protect working conditions and salaries for these men when they return, after risking their lives to protect everything we have. F. E. F.

The Post Impressionist

Misc. For Sale

"Oh dear!" I exclaimed last Sunday afternoon from behind the classified ad section of The Washington Post. "Oh dear!" said I.

"What's the matter, Mummy?" piped up Quarter Past Four from behind the Teenie Weenie page. "Is it raining again?"

"No. But it will," I answered.

"Well, what is the matter then?" asked my husband poking his head over the edge of the editorial section.

"No buckwheat blower today," I answered. "You don't suppose that guy's sold it after all these years?"

"What is a buckwheat blower?" asked Quarter Past Four.

"I don't know," I confessed.

"Well," put in my husband, "it's a——"

"No!" I exclaimed. "Don't tell us! I'd rather keep on thinking it's something that blows buckwheat around. Wouldn't you?" I asked Quarter Past Four.

"All right, if you want to remain ignorant. But anybody knows it's a——"

"Don't you dare tell us!"

"Don't tell, Daddy!" squealed Quarter Past Four.

My husband subsided behind the editorial section.

"Do you need a stuffed owl?" I asked after a bit. "Here's someone who wants to sell an acetylene torch and a stuffed owl. Reasonable."

"Goody!" cried Quarter Past Four. "Let's get a stuffed owl!"

"All right. You make the call," I said to my husband. "Wisconsin 41——"

"You make it. It's your idea. Only don't be surprised if I disappear when the stuffed owl appears in this house."

"Heck!" I said. "And only the other day I was thinking how nice it would be if we had a reasonable stuffed owl."

"What is reasonable?" asked Quarter Past Four.

"It means, honey," said I, "that it wants a mouse only once in a while."

"Your mother is talking through her hat," remarked my husband.

"Are stuffed owls fierce?" asked Quarter Past Four.

"Not if they're reasonable. Sometimes, though, you come across one that isn't, and then it growls at you."

"What does it growl?" pursued Quarter Past Four.

"It growls, 'where is that hamper of mice?'"

"Piffle talk," remarked Quarter Past Four returning to the Teenie Weenie page.

"Double piffle talk," remarked my husband, retiring to the editorial section.

"Well then," said I, "how about a grease trap? Just the other day I was thinking we ought to get one. And here's a nice one. Good condition. Cheap."

"What is a grease trap?" asked Quarter Past Four.

"It's a contraption for," I began.

"It's for—what is a grease trap?"

"It's a contraption for catching more than one grouse in," answered my husband.

"Oh, yes, of course: Grouse, grease, gross," I said. "Do you like grouse?"

"I like mine pickled in nearbeer," he answered.

"I like mine baked with a marshmallow on its nose," informed Quarter Past Four.

"Expensive taste," remarked my husband. "Where does she get those ideas? Next she'll be wanting a bunch of bananas smothered in bacon."

"Oh, here's something we really need," I cried.

"What now?"

"A canvas boat," I read. "Fifteen dollars. We could use it between the house and garage these days. Shall I call up about it? Or no—here's something even better. A sloop, 46 feet. New dink, it says."

"Nope," said my husband. "A sloop with an old dink is better. Runs better."

"Why, Daddy?"

"Nobody knows. One of the mysteries of science."

"Oh"

"Well, then, shall I call about the canvas boat? Or maybe we could get the sloop and find an old dink for it. I'm sure there'll be several old dinks for sale in next Sunday's paper. Oh, look, here's a skunk coat somebody wants to sell."

"Oh, Mummy! What you said!" exclaimed Quarter Past Four.

"I guess I'd better not get it, then. But I did so want a—one of those."

"Are you all through?" asked my husband.

"Yes, I guess so. Oh, wait, not yet! Here's something we've been looking for for a long time."

"What, Mummy?" asked Quarter Past Four.

"Yes, what now?" asked my husband.

"A Quick Disposal! And this one is cheap too. It says right here, 'Quick Disposal, cheap,' it says."

"What is a Quick Disposal?" asked Quarter Past Four.

"It's what your mother is going to get if she doesn't leave off and get us something to eat," answered my husband.

"All right," I said, tossing the classified ad section aside. "Do you want lamb, lamb, or lamb?"

"I think I'd rather have lamb today," answered my husband after a little thought.

"Me too," said Quarter Past Four.

The Propaganda Front

By William L. Shirer

If the Axis is driven out of North Africa and we go on from that job to the next one of opening an attack on Axis Europe from the south, the first battles probably will be fought on the soil of Italy. How will the Italian people react to that? What will they do? Can we count upon them for aid? Can we prepare the ground politically and propagandistically as we did in French Africa?

These are questions which were academic yesterday, but have suddenly become extremely urgent as the result of the Anglo-American occupation of French Africa. If we can get the correct answers to them and act accordingly half the battle for Italy may be won before the guns go off and the bombs start to fall.

The reaction of the Fascist regime to our occupation of Africa is well worth noting as a guide to future action. For the first few days—until Berlin had determined the Axis propaganda line—Rome was stunned by the blow. The British-American landings in Algeria meant only one thing, Rome told the Italian people: an early invasion of Italy. This was a prospect that Mussolini evidently had not faced and the broadcasts and the editorials in the press made it clear he did not like it. Not since Italy skipped into the war have the Italian press and radio sounded so defeatist. Resignation to approaching catastrophe was about all the Roman leaders could offer during the first few days. Later, when they had recovered their breath they took a more heroic stand, but their fear of the new situation was still there. Said one official to the people of Rome: "We are confronted by one of the great trials that history reserves to peoples who wish to prove their worth. . . . To bear adversity manly and to overcome it with courage is a virtue we acquired 25 centuries ago."

Italian Radio Always Tips Off

Gone was the old Fascist braggadocio.

To the outside world, Rome, after it had recovered from the initial shock, broadcast loudly that "contrary to rumors abroad perfect calm reigns in Italy and the people look forward to further developments with calm equanimity and firm confidence. The morale offensive against the Italian people has completely failed."

This, too, seemed to be a give-away. Cecil Brown, who came to know the Italian broadcasters rather intimately, remarked after hearing this broadcast: "The Italian radio always tips you off. Anyone who has worked in Rome knows that when all hell is breaking loose, the Italians go on the air to tell the world how calm things are."

Was Italy also tired? The Giornale d'Italia brought up the subject by denying it. It wrote: "Italy is neither tired nor discouraged and will continue to fight." Possibly this curious affirmation was deemed necessary to Signor Gayda's newspaper to counteract Italian fatigue and even a lack of will "to continue the fight."

But if we are to soften up Italy still more politically preparatory to military invasion, how is it to be done? It cannot be said that our propaganda to Italy thus far has been particularly brilliant. This is not so much the fault of our propagandists as it is our failure to make up our minds as to just what our policy toward the Italians should be.

Does our Government agree with Mr. Churchill who said in December, 1940, that if the Italians threw overboard "one man and one man alone," Mussolini, a separate peace could be arranged? With whom? The other Fascist leaders like Grandi? The army? The royal family?

There has been much talk in London and Washington this past year about the possibility—indeed the desirability—of negotiating with the House of Savoy. But those—both Italians and Americans—who would appear to know present conditions on the peninsula best tell us that this is a childish idea. Gaetano Salvemini, somewhat surprised at the spectacle of the British Broadcasting Co., on the late date of November 11, 1941, sending the King of Italy birthday greetings, was moved to comment that "in Italy . . . the King is held in contempt . . . everyone knows that his mind is affected and that his wife has to keep him busy in the evenings playing a card game analogous to the American 'slap-jack!'"

Italy's Royal Family

Reynolds and Eleanor Packard, in their very sober and objective book on Italy, "Balcony Empire," remark that "both Americans and English vastly overestimate the personal standing and influence of the royal family in Italy." I have heard some officials in London and Washington pin their hopes on Crown Prince Umberto, who once had anti-Fascist leanings, but lost them. Both the Packards and Salvemini hold this idea to be preposterous. Others have had hopes in Marshal Badoglio, who is known to be anti-Fascist. The Packards, just back from Italy, are certain that Badoglio is "too cautious." "He would never risk," they write, "a revolution unless he had an 80 per cent chance of success."

If the Packards are right neither would the mass of the Italian people. Despite the millions of Italians who make up our Nation we seem to have little understanding of Italian character. The Packards remind us that "the Italians are an extremely old and disillusioned race which has already lived through every known phase of human development, including triumphs, decadence and disappointments. . . . Because Italians prefer the simple life does not mean they are simple-minded. On the contrary, they are historically oversophisticated and ultra-cynical. . . . They are not going to spill their blood for liberty and democracy unless they see a 75 per cent chance of material success. Exhortations from America and Britain that the Italians should overthrow the Fascist yoke in order to achieve freedom and independence fall upon skeptical ears."

Until recently a great deal of our propaganda to Italy consisted of just such exhortations.

But the Packards do believe that the great mass of Italians would rise up if Anglo-American troops should make a landing in force and if the people were politically prepared for it. To help prepare them has now become one of the major tasks of our political warfare chiefs.

Political Warfare Not Simple

The confusion among the United Nations as the result of our dealings with Admiral Jean Darlan reminded us this last week that political warfare is not altogether a simple matter. But the President's statement on Tuesday emphasizing that the arrangement was temporary did much to clear up a mess that might have had very serious long-term effects, especially in France and the occupied lands. What seems to have been forgotten by many well meaning persons was that General Eisenhower was confronted with the choice of temporarily using Darlan so that he could fight Germans or of not using him and fighting 200,000 French troops. It was unfortunate that the choice was such, but that was not the general's fault. And it is Germans, not Frenchmen, is it not, that we ought to fight to win the war?

German counterpropaganda to our landings in Africa—it took Goebbels a week to figure it out—took two main lines. It exaggerated Anglo-American shipping losses in the Mediterranean and it hammered away at the theme that Hitler's Europe had become an "impregnable fortress" and that, therefore, there was no danger of invasion from the south. The German people in the home broadcasts were assured that the events in the Mediterranean were of little importance and that the war would be decided not in Africa, but in Europe.

ERNEST LINDLEY

LINDLEY

Most wars have found the Vatican in a neutral corner working for negotiated peace. Recent exceptions were the Italo-Ethiopian and Spanish Civil wars. In the first, it hoped to extend and in the second, regain, its spiritual domain. But the peace policy was vigorously pursued through 1914-18.

A few days after the first World War began, Pius X died. Thereupon, in an address, Cardinal Chiesa, Archbishop of Bologna, emphasized the importance to the Holy See of staying neutral and striving for peace. Chronicles of the time say the address was much in the minds of the college of cardinals when, a few weeks later they elected him Pope Benedict XV.

Benedict worked ceaselessly but futilely to shorten the war. Britain, France and Italy, knowing his sympathy for Catholic Austria-Hungary, rejected his efforts. They were resolved to beat the enemy in the field, which, with our help, they finally did. Benedict persisted almost to the end, however. At that time, Italy had no influence or relations with the Vatican court.

When, on the eve of this war, the present Pope Pius XII was enthroned, Vatican relations with Italy were improved. Mussolini had recognized papal sovereignty over Vatican City in a concordat giving the Italian government certain influence in the secular affairs of the Italian Catholic Church.

Relations Strained

German relations with the Vatican, however, were far from correct. Repeated violations of their concordat with the Pope had brought upon the Nazis, first the remonstrance, then the open condemnation, of Cardinal Pacelli, papal secretary of state. Remembering also the cardinal's conference with President Roosevelt, his tour of the United States and expressed admiration for American ways, they sought brazenly but unsuccessfully to balk his election as Pope.

Nevertheless, the new pontiff, Pius XII, worked to avert the war and, failing in that, cast about for ways to effect its speedy end. The messages which he and President Roosevelt exchanged at Christmastide, 1939, pledged mutual efforts to relieve the war's suffering and a concerted search for peace.

On this quest Myron Taylor and Undersecretary of State Sumner Welles went to Europe on the same boat in February, 1940. Taylor went as the President's personal representative to the Vatican. Welles to explore war aims and prospects of conciliation in personal conferences with Mussolini, Hitler, Chamberlain and Daladier. Welles apparently found no hope of conciliating Hitler. But he reopened direct connections between the President and Mussolini, which had been broken shortly after Munich, and our Government made strenuous diplomatic efforts to limit the war's spread by keeping Mussolini out. What, if anything, Taylor was able to do through the Vatican in support of this policy is obscure.

But since Italy entered the war, there has been no sign of a peace move from the Vatican; and nothing in the available records supports the rumors that the Axis has attempted to make the Vatican a channel for peace soundings.

Now the turn of the North African battle tides exposes the Italian homeland to the war blows her troops found unbearable in their defense of their empire overseas. Virginia Gayda finds it necessary to discuss in the Fascist press whether the Axis is being defeated, trying by bombastic denials to down Italian fears.

A fortnight ago, Darlan, whose reputed Anglophobia made him a supposed Nazi tool, turned up to claim leadership of the liberated North African French. Will Mussolini, profiting by that example, try to break the German shackles, negotiate a separate peace and ask Vatican moral support to swing the Italian nation on a new course? Political warfare produces fantastic turns.

Or will the Nazis, themselves, seeing the handwriting on the wall, concert with Mussolini in appealing to the Pope to attempt to negotiate peace to halt Bolshevism and stanch Europe's blood flow? The Vatican stood aloof when Hitler clothed his treacherous attack on Russia in the trappings of an anti-Bolshevik crusade but desperation may drive him to repeat old tricks.

The Vatican maintains diplomatic relations with other governments only on Mussolini's sufference. Pius XII has only his moral authority as a shield against the physical captivity imposed by Napoleon on Pius VII. The Vatican therefore keeps its own counsel.

The United Nations' declaration binds all signatories to gain a total victory and commits them against a separate peace. The statements and policies of the Catholic hierarchy in countries where it is free to speak and act indicate unmistakably where the church's sympathies lie. Most revealing of such statements, however, come from the hierarchy in Germany itself.

Bishops Protested

In a pastoral letter drafted at their 1941 meeting at Fulda, the German bishops publicly protested Nazi "persecution," noted the "abolition of Catholic kindergartens," the "suppression of Catholic schools," interference with worship, and declared "the very existence or annihilation of Christianity in Germany was at stake. The bishops prayed for the safety of German troops, but made no mention of the victory of their arms. The letter was widely publicized in our secular and Catholic press.

The 1942 pastoral letter, received here a month ago, although it got little public attention, was also significant. A single, guarded paragraph indicated the previous year's trials were unabated and that the bishops no longer could speak out. It said:

"During these days we have been occupied with serious questions and immediate anxieties and we considered it our sacred duty to turn to the competent authorities. However, in this time of war difficulties, we do not think it appropriate to give further details."

The text available here made no reference to bolshevism but prayed for a "beneficent peace for nation and country and to all of us on earth." Contrast this with last week's statement by the American Catholic bishops declaring that "totalitarians, Nazi, Communist or Fascist, cannot write a lasting peace," a statement accusing the Nazis of waging war to create a "slave world," indicating their "murderous assault on Poland" and their "satanic technique" in persecuting Jews, and ruling out compromise as "impossible."

Pledge Reassuring

A timely reference to the President's disclaimer of designs of conquest in the occupation of North Africa showed the American bishops' eagerness to support our policies there. The statement that the President's pledge "mirrors the mind and conscience of the American people" doubtless carried more weight with the French people than the Nazis' shrill claims that their empire was being torn from them.

In Latin America, also, the American bishops are being heard to good effect. There, the Spanish Falange has been representing us as a nation of mercenary pagans, who would put Latin America in economic bondage and subordinate its culture to ours. The American bishops recently conducted in Washington an inter-American seminar, designed to harmonize Catholic social programs throughout the Western Hemisphere. The subject was nonpolitical but the Latin American delegates went away realizing that Catholicism here, as well as in their countries, is a vital force.

But the Falange's propaganda already had been measurably muffled as a result of the hostility of the hierarchy and the Army in Spain, itself. Both resented the Falange's blatant Nazism. The hierarchy was further aroused by its bid for control of the Spanish schools, while the lesser clergy and public despised its members for their opportunism and graft. When, therefore, Dictator Franco dismissed its leader, Foreign Minister Serrano Suner, the Falange meekly accepted Franco's "protection" and has been shifting over to a more innocuous line. A fifth column on which Germany until recently could count in a drive through Spain on Gibraltar is being neutralized, just when needed most urgently, perhaps, to offset the Allied North African stroke.

Thus, the morally bankrupt Axis begins to pay in unexpected ways for flouting a force it believed impotent because unarmed.

MARK SULLIVAN

SULLIVAN

As a result of the election this month, the new Congress created by the election, and the sitting of this new Congress next January, America will enter upon a changed course—a changed course, but not a reversed course. In many respects there will be no change at all. As to fighting an all-out war, the new Congress will be as determined as the old, rather more so. As to domestic policies, there will be reverses of some, modifications of some, and as to others, little or no change. The sum of all will be a modified direction, though by no means a reversed direction.

No Postmortem

To understand the coming change, a good way is to begin by inquiring just why the country voted as it did. That is, what were the causes, in the minds of voters, that reduced a large Democratic majority in the House to a majority of only five?

To answer the question would be to make a postmortem analysis of the election returns. Of such there have been many, and this article is not going to add to the number. Instead of a postmortem, I here reprint a diagnosis of political trends made two months preceding the election. It is remarkable for its accuracy. It is further remarkable because it was made by a New Dealer, Irving Dillard of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and was printed in a New Deal periodical, the New Republic. The diagnosis was thus against self-interest, and hence the more remarkable for its accuracy, as proved by the election.

Mr. Dillard's diagnosis—printed September 7—was borne out by the ensuing postmortem more accurately than is universal among physicians. As a forecaster, Mr. Dillard may be recommended to succeed Dr. Gallup, whose divination by polls turned out on this occasion to be materially less than perfect. What Mr. Dillard wrote in advance of the election can be read today as a blueprint of what the people want.

With this over-long introduction, I quote most of the 17 numbered reasons Mr. Dillard listed as composing a trend against the party in power. The omissions, dictated by space and here indicated by dots (. . .), have been made with care not to change the sense of what is quoted:

"1. Many citizens are genuinely distressed at the halting, uncertain way in which the war is being administered. They remember Pearl Harbor—they also remember the Normandie. . . .

"2. Many citizens . . . hoped that prices would be controlled, that inflation would be prevented. They have been sorely disappointed. They have seen the cost of living go up. They have watched the decline in the purchasing power of their war bonds. They think their Government failed to show the resolution which would have avoided this. . . .

"4. The policy of 'politics as usual' has disheartened many citizens. In New Jersey they have seen a Federal judgeship go to Boss Hague's 'pawn.' . . . In New York they have seen the ill-fated attempt to bring about a nomination of a hand-picked Democratic candidate for Governor. They do not understand why the Administration should ask the people to suspend politics as usual for the duration and then play machine politics as usual itself.

'Ahead of Washington'

"5. A great many citizens have been deeply offended by the repeated exhortations to the country to wake up to the war. . . . Many citizens genuinely believe that the counrty as a whole is ahead of the East on the war and is definitely ahead of Washington.

"6. A large number of citizens resent what they consider the attempts to purge out the so-called isolationist or anti-interventionist (before Pearl Harbor) members of Congress. Many Americans who sincerely opposed involvement in the war are now wholeheartedly in the war effort. Their patriotism is unquestioned. Yet the purge is necessarily a reflection on them. . . .

"7. The operation of the censorship has displeased many citizens . . . they think that much has been kept from them for no good reason. . . .

"8. Many voters have become convinced that an increase in the minority in Congress will be a wholesome thing—that opposition members can put burrs under saddles and so speed the war effort in a way denied to Administration members.

"9. The boom which is on in war production areas has adversely affected many small cities and towns whose workers are being siphoned off to a relatively few places. . . . Many citizens in these declining communities think that with a little planning, war industries could have been distributed so as to allay this tremendous social and economic dislocation.

"10. Recent signs, especially in connection with the New York Governorship fight, have convinced opponents of a fourth term that the 1942 congressional election will have a distinct bearing on 1944. A Democratic House, they feel, will be on the side of a fourth term; a Republican House will produce anti-fourth-term influences, even among the Democrats. Akin to those who vote against a fourth term are those who will vote to preserve the two-party system in the belief that a stronger and still more watchful opposition is vital to the operation of our democracy.

"11. The Administration's labor policy will cost it votes. . . .

"12. The conviction is growing that the administration of the war has been too personal, too much in the hands of an inner circle. . . . Housecleanings have not been housecleanings; the personnel is shifted around and nearly everyone stays on at some position or other."

The paragraphs quoted compose most of Mr. Dillard's pre-election diagnosis, made early in September. It is interesting as having been written by a New Dealer. Possibly for that reason, it is incomplete. Additional causes of the pre-election state of mind were given the other day by Representative Joseph W. Martin, Republican national chairman. He said that in campaign speeches by Republican candidates, criticizing the Administration, there were two points that always get the most applause.

1. Government waste, the necessity for economy. In almost every community voters have seen or heard about examples of grosaly extravagant expenditures in many forms.

2. Apprehension that the Administration may extend its war powers into peacetime. Hence insistence that war powers given the President by Congress be strictly limited in time, so that they will end when the war ends.

Carl Sandburg

If You Have 'Precious Inside Information' Trust It To the Stove—Its Spilled Ashes Won't Help the Axis!

At one of the embarkation ports they tell about a young Filipino off a boat that had been torpedoed and sunk.

"You were on deck when it happened," said an inquiring officer. "Now tell us just how it looked to you when it happened. What did you see and hear?"

With a slight pause between two words came the answer: "Boom, . . . swim."

The boy knows his verbs. He is a "Spik" who can speak. If he had been an imitation instead of the real thing he would have said, "Sighted by sub, sunk by same," instead of "Boom" for what the torpedo did and "Swim" for what he did.

Also at this embarkation port, if you should make the rounds you might hear of the secret paper burner. Every well equipped office, station, post or bureau of the Army, of enough importance to be receiving secret papers about what to do next or where to go from here, has its nice little secret paper burner.

A little sheet-iron affair with a sweet little smokestack, it looks like a tiny wood stove shrunk till it isn't much bigger than the common electric bread toaster. In our military establishment now there are thousands of these in use and every day they are fed several tons of secret papers. In nearly every case when a secret paper arrives, so soon as it is read it is fed into the burner.

The best place for some kinds of military secrets is in the heads of trusted and worthy men rather than typed on irresponsible paper that unless burned may tattle and blab—so goes the theory of the handy little stoves that make ashes of precious inside information.

Any secret paper, of course, seems important till you read it. Then it may turn out to be petty and ridiculous. In some cases the supposed secret paper merely tells what everybody knows. Then again a single sheet of paper may almost shake and cry over the fate and possibilities it involves. "Burn it," is the order. Burn it and lessen the risk to priceless cargo and to living men.

When you see before your eyes some of the men, docks, derricks, and ships, working on the most colossal loading, hauling and delivery job ever undertaken in the history of mankind, it makes you sober no matter how sober you were before.

The men on this job, their first name is worry. The one of the four freedoms least easy for them to manage is freedom from fear. And any time a reporter should get too enterprising with details about how and what they fear, he would be on the edge of blabbing military secrets.

There is a nice sound to Elmer Davis, the OWI head, saying, "The public is getting whatever our military people know as fast as they know it, limited only by genuine considerations for military secrecy."

It is quite likely Davis has been learning from the armed services while they have learned from him. Certainly the Army and Navy heads could well study the frank self-effacement and the shining candor of Mr. Davis regarding the two-month withholding of news of the sinking of three United States cruisers in the Pacific. Mr. Davis has the tone of one of President Lincoln's letters to General Grant in saying: "That was my soon as they did."

Atlantic Charter and pursuant to the pledges contained in our mutual-aid agreements with many of our Allies, which we believe to be desirable and necessary for the maintenance of a peaceful and prosperous world of the future.

We all envisage the tragic chaos and anarchy which will have engulfed Europe and a great part of the rest of the world by the time Hitler's brief day is done, and when he and his accomplices confront their judges. The United Nation's machinery for relief and rehabilitation must be prepared to operate without a moment's delay . . .

Opposes Extreme Views

As the months pass two extreme schools of thought will become more and more vocal—the first, stemming from the leaders of the group which preached extreme isolation, will once more proclaim that war in the rest of the world every 20 years or so is inevitable; that we can stay out if we so desire, and that any assumption by this country of any form of responsibility for what goes on in the world means our unnecessary involvement in war; the other, of which very often men of the highest idealism and sincerity are the spokesmen, will maintain that the United States must assume the burdens of the entire globe; must see to it that the standards in which we ourselves believe must immediately be adopted by all of the peoples of the earth, and must undertake to inculcate in all parts of the world our own policies of social and political reform, whether the other peoples involved so desire or not. While under a different guise, this school of thought is in no way dissimilar in theory from the strange doctrine of incipient "bear-the-white-man's-burden" imperialism which flared in this country in the first years of this century.

The people of the United States today realize that the adoption of either one of these two philosophies would prove equally dangerous to the future well-being of our Nation.

Our free world must be founded on the four freedoms—freedom of speech and of religion—and freedom from want and from fear.

I do not believe that the two first freedoms—of speech and of religion—can ever be assured to mankind, so long as want and war are permitted to ravage the earth. Freedom of speech and of religion need only protection; they require only relief from obstruction.

Freedom from fear—the assurance of peace; and freedom from want—the assurance of individual personal security, require all of the implementation which the genius of man can devise through effective forms of international cooperation.

Peace—freedom from fear—cannot be assured until the nations of the world, particularly the great powers, and that includes the United States, recognize that the threat of war anywhere throughout the globe threatens their own security—and until they are jointly willing to exercise the police powers necessary to prevent such threats from materializing into armed hostilities.

And since policemen might be tyrants if they had no political superiors, freedom from fear also demands some form of organized international political cooperation, to make the rules of international living and to change them as the years go by, and some sort of international court to adjudicate disputes. With effective institutions of that character to insure equity and justice, and the continued will to make them work, the peoples of the world should at length be able to live out their lives in peace.

Freedom Requirements

Freedom from want requires these things:

People who want to work must be able to find useful jobs, not sometimes, not in good years only, but continuously.

These jobs must be at things which they do well, and which can be done well in the places where they work.

They must be able to exchange the things which they produce, on fair terms, for other things which other people, often in other places, can make better than they.

Efficient and continuous production, and fair exchange, are both necessary to the abundance which we seek, and they depend upon each other. In the past we have succeeded better with production than exchange. Production is called into existence by the prospects for exchange, prospects which have constantly been thwarted by all kinds of inequalities, imperfections and restrictions . . .

It will take much wisdom, much co-operative effort, and much surrender of private, short-sighted and sectional self-interest to make these things all come true, but the goal is freedom from want—individual security and national prosperity—and is everlastingly worth striving for . . .

Army Trained for Occupation

where the top administrative personnel for military governments is being trained. Not to be governors, but to be administrative assistants to the military governors. The school has a present authorized student body of 150 officers. Ninety-nine per cent of the students have primarily a civilian background. They are for the most part National Guard and reserve officers with a small number chosen from civilian life through the former Army Specialist Corps. Only three have been members of the regular army. Nearly all have had extended administrative experience. . . .

While a background of international law and of the general principles of public administration is, of course, presented, 70 per cent of the students' time is spent on practical problems dealing with the areas of potential occupation.

These problems include not only studies of the laws, customs, economy and psychology of definite areas now in hostile hands but involve especially the preparation of definite plans for the taking over of those areas. . . .

At Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., we are opening two other schools for the training of junior commissioned personnel officers and occupational military police. At the same time we are creating a large pool of expert technical and professional personnel.

As I have said, the task of the Army in any military government is primarily an administrative one. Most of its larger policies, those that will carry over into the civilian government, will be determined by agencies other than the War Department or the Army. For example, political policy will be formulated by the State Department; fiscal policy by the Treasury Department; economic policy by the State Department or the Board of Economic Welfare, or both. Yet it will be the duty of the Army to administer these policies before surrendering control to some civilian agency.

For these purposes it will require, in addition to any administrative personnel, a large technical and professional personnel. These are now being selected from nominations made by all those civilian agencies of the Government which will have immediate or ultimate policy interest in any occupied territory. We are doing this, first, because we believe that these civilian agencies are better qualified to make these selections than is the Army, and, second, because these agencies will probably eventually make use of most of the same personnel when civil government begins.

We plan to leave these technicians in their present useful civilian pursuits until they are needed abroad, at which time they will be immediately available. In the meantime, however, we are earmarking them all for duty in special areas and then, in cooperation with a number of colleges and universities, expect to give them some brief training in the backgrounds of those areas in which they will ultimately serve. . . .

Auburn Stops Ga., 27-13, In Big Upset

Bulldogs Stunned As Tigers Rise Up And Smear Chances For National Title

By the Associated Press

Columbus, Ga., Nov. 21.—You may bow in silent meditation tonight for a gridiron empire that was.

Georgia lost today to a brilliant and underrated Auburn, 27-13, and the crash of America's No. 1 football team probably resounded all the way to Pasadena, Calif.

While 20,000 hysterical fans looked on—a goodly majority cheering for Auburn—the Tigers of mild Jack Meagher snatched a rumored Rose Bowl invitation out of Georgia's hip pocket and kicked it all around Memorial Stadium in a decisive 56-minute rout.

Bulldogs Holler "Uncle"

Georgia won the toss and scored the first touchdown within four minutes of the opening kickoff. Then Auburn took the initiative and hammered Georgia until the boys from Athens hollered "uncle." Six minutes and 13 plays were all it took for Big Jim Reynolds and will-o'-the-wisp Monk Gafford to whipsaw Georgia for a 7-6 lead, and from there on Auburn devoted itself exclusively to knocking Georgia out of a national championship.

At half time Auburn was leading, 14-6. . . .

At the third quarter it was still 14-6, and Georgia fighting for a break to turn the tide. Then Auburn punched over another touchdown, watched Georgia match it, and finally lashed out with the coup de grace, a fourth touchdown scored when Frankie Sinkwich was knocked down behind his own goal in an attempt to pass, and Fagan Canzoneri fell on the fumbled ball.

Kills National Title Hopes

The spectacular upset—the second in two weeks for the up-and-down Auburn's—snapped Georgia's string of victories at 15 straight and knocked out what had promised to be a national championship game at Athens a week hence when Georgia meets Georgia Tech. While Georgia was going down to defeat,

Terps Have Time Beating W. & L., 32-28

By Merrell W. Whittlesey

Maryland closed its golden anniversary football season in victory yesterday but no team in the 50-year gridiron history of College Park was happier to hear the final gun than Clark Shaughnessy's dazed and bewildered charges.

A Washington and Lee eleven which had been kicked all over the South, compiling one of the worst football records of that famous Virginia university had suddenly come to life with 14 points in the last three minutes but time ran out on the gallant Generals and left them on the short end of a 32-to-28 score.

The 8000 fans gathered in Byrd Stadium for Maryland's home-coming clash settled back after Maryland ran up 20 points in the first period, expecting the Terps to close the school's most successful season in several years in high scoring fashion.

The Old Liners were just about through after that first period, however, and for the last three periods they were outscored, four touchdowns to two, by the Generals, who produced a 16-point scorer in little Dave Russell. The 160-pound halfback ran 75 yards with a recovered fumble, scored on a pass from Bill Babcock, a play which covered 61 yards, and in addition he booted four extra points.

Russell's marvelous catch of a

Ohio State Defeats Michigan; Takes Title

Buckeyes, Scoring Three Times Through Air, Register 21-7 Victory Before 71,000 Fans

By the Associated Press

Columbus, Ohio, Nov. 21.—Ohio State, a brilliant precision football machine, overpowered its bitterest rival, Michigan, 21 to 7, to win an undisputed Western Conference championship today.

The victory was sweet to Ohio in more ways than one. It was the first time the Bucks have beaten Michigan since 1937, and it was the first win over a Michigan team coached by the Wily Fritz Crisler.

The 71,896 fans who saw the game raised Ohio's attendance for five home games to 279,945.

The conference title was Ohio's second since 1939, and the first for its youthful coach, Paul Brown.

Three Scores on Passes

Ohio's three touchdowns came on passes. . . . Passes that were handled with deadly accuracy despite a slippery ball. But the Bucks' winning margin of two touchdowns came as its alert, hard-charging eleven capitalized on two breaks.

Michigan also set up its only score on passes, although the touchdown was scored through the line.

The fact that both teams resorted to the aerial game attested to the power of Michigan's "seven oak posts," the linemen who played the entire 60 minutes with only one substitution, and Ohio's stellar line.

It was an Ohio lineman, Charles Csuri of Cleveland, who paved the way for the first score. Csuri, the Bucks' All-America tackle candidate, broke through in the second period to block a punt by Michigan's Tom Kuzma. Ohio got the ball on the Wolverine 35.

Turn About Nets Touchdown

Little Les Horvath, 166 pounds of dynamite, hurled a 20-yard pass to speedy Paul Sarringhaus. Then the two halfbacks reversed the procedure. Horvath passed from the 12 to Sarringhaus over the goal line.

Ohio led, 7 to 0, at the half after almost taking the heart out of the Wolverines by stopping them on the 3-yard line after an aerial attack had taken them 40 yards. The half-time gun was all that kept Michigan from scoring.

After an exchange of punts in the third period, Ohio got the ball on its own 36. Three plays later Sarringhaus and lanky Bob Shaw, Ohio end engineered a 58-yard touchdown pass play.

Sarringhaus pitched the ball 23 yards to Shaw, who grabbed it on the Michigan 35. Stepping along like a toe dancer a few inches inside the sideline, Shaw eluded three tacklers to cover the distance to the goal.

Michigan got back into the ball game with its own aerial attack. Taking an out-of-bounds kickoff on their own 35, the Wolverines

Ceryance Helps Lions Beat Bisons

By Anne Hagner

The guardin'est goalie to tend a Washington net all season—that is what 3000 fans last night dubbed newcomer Frank Ceryance as he personally received much of the credit for the Lions' 4-to-3 victory over the Buffalo Bisons at Uline Arena.

On loan from the Hershey Bears, Ceryance brought about the Lions' first victory in four starts over Buffalo, now leading the standings of the American Hockey League, as he made 35 saves—most of them of the sensational variety. Gordon Bell, Bison goalie, was credited with 10 saves.

The addition of Ceryance to the

By the Associated Press

Yale Bowl, New Haven, Conn., Nov. 21.—Gridiron glory returned to Yale today as Hugh Knowlton and Townsend W. (Tim) Hoopes maneuvered a 62-yard touchdown pass in the gathering dusk of the final period to whip Harvard's Crimson, 7 to 3, before a small collection of 23,500 fans in Yale Bowl.

It was a sudden, surprising stab that ended Harvard's hex over the Elis, who had not been able to score against their historic foe since 1939, and it gave Yale the championship of the Big Three.

The blow came with six minutes to play in the last quarter and developed so quickly that there was little drama in it.

Knowlton, a 19-year-old sophomore, had entered the game a few moments earlier when the Elis were tired and trailing by three points as the result of an 18-yard Harvard field goal in the second stanza. His first action was to return a punt mildly seven yards to Yale's 38. Then on his first offensive play he faded back and threw a sharp pass to Hoopes in midfield. The receiver was soon surrounded by a swarm of Crimson jerseys, but reversed his field and dashed across the field and goalward without interference.

Fred Dent placekicked the extra point. Then came the drama, because Harvard took the succeeding kickoff and drove 93 yards before

Hoyas Trample Colonials to Take Mythical D. C. Championship

By Bill Burnett
Post Staff Writer

In the best traditions of their 52-year rivalry—uninterrupted success for Georgetown and futility for George Washington University—the Hoyas romped to a 21-0 victory over the Colonials yesterday.

It was the oft-told story of a punchless G. W. U. team smeared in its attacking attempts. Ten thousand Griffith Stadium fans watched Georgetown turn back the one, lonesome scoring threat of the Colonials.

George Washington's annual effort to beat the Hoyas was a sorry one. Four minutes after the opening kick-off, Halfback Frank Seano fumbled the pass from center the first time the Colonials were in possession of the ball, and Georgetown recovered on the G. W. U. 19-yard line to pave the way for a rapid touchdown.

A look at the passing statistics was indicative of the kind of battle it was. Between them the teams tried 60 aerials, completing 11. Nine, however, fell into enemy hands. G. U., which was completing a record of five won, three lost, and one tied for the season, made good on 12 of 28 tosses, 6 to its own players and as many to the opposition.

Closing its first year under the guidance of former Grad Johnny Baker with its sixth loss in nine games, George Washington was beaten from the first five minutes on. It never was a serious threat as it sought to break a Georgetown University deathlock of the series which dated back to 1890.

If there was an individual star on the field he was Johnny Barrett, senior fullback who scored two of the winning touchdowns. But a lot of futile scrambling on the part of everybody interspersed the Hoyas' three touchdown marches.

G. W. miscued the first time it got the ball and Georgetown made it pay off. Frank Seno attempted a dash through center as G. U.'s opening drive had fizzled, fumbled, and big George Perpich recovered

By Bob Considine

New York, Nov. 21.—Army made a stumbling sparring mate out of Princeton today at the Yankee Stadium, drubbing the Tigers 40 to 7 before a crowd of 30,000.

With one eye cocked on next week's big game against Navy, and the other eye on an adding machine, the dynamic Cadets sprayed through Princeton's line like a fire hose through a picket fence. They scored in every period when they were not rolling to touchdowns by means of ground plays they passing Princeton dizzy.

The lone Princeton tally was the result of three fourth-period desperation passes that clicked against Army's third string team.

By that time Army was far beyond reach and well on its way to scoring one of its most decisive victories in years.

The Cadets finally amassed 514 yards as opposed to Princeton's 162. Princeton's running streak functioned for only 48 yards against the Army's front at barrier, while an endless stream of Army backs were running 388 yards through and around the Tiger line.

The entire West Point Cadet Corps, witnessing their final games of the season, and perhaps for the duration, saw Hank Mazur open the floodgates of Army touchdowns in the first period by sparking a 100-yard march and passing to Tom Lombardo for the first Army score.

Army swept 63 yards in two plays to score its second touchdown. Carl Anderson reversed from his 37 to Princeton's 26. Then Bob Woods, who transferred from Navy, gave warning that he'll be a boomerang next week by charg-

Much to the surprise of no one, Georgetown is still the college grid champion of Washington proper today, and least surprised of all is George Washington's first-year coach, Johnny Baker . . . After his Colonials had taken that 21-0 drubbing from the Hoyas yesterday Coach Baker was brief in his comment . . . "I think my boys did as well as could be expected," he said.

The game, if nothing else, produced one record for the local season . . . The shortest punt . . . Georgetown's Art Hines got credit when he dropped back in the second period . . . Exactly no yardage was covered as the ball, slithering off the big soph's foot, went out of bounds at the line of scrimmage . . . G. W. came back and

Lafayette Ties Lehigh, First Time Since 1889 Game

By the Associated Press

Easton, Pa., Nov. 21.—Lafayette and Lehigh, staging the seventy-sixth game in the Nation's longest unbroken gridiron series, battled to a 7-to-7 tie here today before 18,000 fans. It was the third deadlock in the long rivalry and the first stalemate since 1889.

Only a stout defense by Lehigh prevented a Lafayette triumph as the Leopards reached the 1-yard stripe in the closing moments of play.

Northwestern Bows To Irish Power, 27-20

By the Associated Press

South Bend, Ind., Nov. 21.—Otto Graham's brilliant passing failed to match the effects of Notre Dame's pulverizing ground attack led by Sophomore Fullback Corwin Clatt today and the Irish snatched a 27-to-20 victory from Northwestern before a crowd of 30,000.

The Irish had to fight from behind twice in the first half to match Northwestern touchdowns and stalemate the score 13 to 13 at intermission, but in the third period Notre Dame pushed across two markers to hole the Wildcats so badly they could not emerge despite a 48-yard drive to a score in the last period.

It was the twenty-second game in the schools' bitter rivalry and left the Irish with 17 wins in the series. The Purple have lost eight out of nine starts this season, including today.

All the game's touchdown output was hooked on the end of long drives. Northwestern marched 39 for the first score when Ed Hirsch rammed over the 2. Clatt capped a 60-yard Irish push with a 5-yard buck before the opening quarter closed.

A 70-yard march by Northwestern in the second quarter blossomed into a score when Graham passed 17 yards to Dud Kean. The Irish came back 61 yards with Clatt wriggling over from the 1. Sub Al Pick kicked one Northwestern extra point while Angelo Bertelli added one for the Irish to clamp the count 13 to 13 at the half.

Notre Dame tucked away the victory in the third, going ahead for the first time on a 79-yard jaunt spearheaded by Clatt's 47 yards of turf ripping in three plays. Sophomore Bob Livingstone topped it off with a 14-yard bolt into the end zone and Bertelli's toe fired the conversion.

With three minutes left in the period, Clatt filched Don Buffmire's pass and raced 15 yards to the Northwestern 44. From there, Bertelli whipped a pass to Joe Limont then connected for a 31-yard touch-

Minnesota Beaten By Wisconsin, 20-6

By the Associated Press

Madison, Wis., Nov. 21.—An alert, efficient Wisconsin football team that smashed 61 yards to score in the first three minutes, checked Minnesota's power drives the rest of the way today to gain a 20 to 6 victory before 46,000 fans.

The Gophers fought back gamely but Wisconsin had the stuff to pull through and turn Gopher mistakes to its own advantage.

Wisconsin scored first on a line smash, added a touchdown late in the second quarter on a pass after recovering a Minnesota fumble on the Gopher 32, and counted with a line plunge at the start of the final period after taking the ball on downs on the Minnesota 19.

The victory gave Wisconsin second place in the Big Ten race and one of the best records of recent years with eight wins, one defeat, and a tie.

Wisconsin took the opening kickoff back to its 31 and promptly started a touchdown march. Elroy Hirsch, fleet sophomore halfback, passed to Dave Schreiner, the Badger All-America end, on the 50. Schreiner was forced out of bounds on the Gopher 40.

Pat Harder, plunging fullback, then took a lateral from Quarterback Ashley Anderson and raced around right end to the 18. He went around left end to the 12 on the next shot and on a third try went over tackle to the 4. Another smash through the line by Harder gave the Badgers a touchdown. Harder kicked the point and Wisconsin led, 7 to 0.

The Gophers drove back to the Wisconsin 28 on quick opening smashes by Vic Kulbitski and Bill Daley, but lost the ball on downs on the 21 early in the second period. Later in the quarter the

Methodists Tie Baylor, 6-All, On 'Lucky' Pass

Waco, Tex., Nov. 21.—Southern Methodist tied Baylor, 6 to 6, today on a long, fourth-period touchdown pass from Frito Gonzales to Harry Miller that definitely put S. M. U. out of the running for the Southwest Conference football championship, but left Baylor still with a mathematical chance.

After two scoreless periods in which the Bruins had two fair chances to tally, Baylor in the third period followed up a pass interception in midfield with a touchdown drive.

Redskins 'Sure' to Beat Dodgers, Clinch Title

2600 Seats Go On Sale This Morning

D. C. Pro Eleven At Full Strength For First Time; Baugh to Start

Barring what would be the biggest upset in the pro football season, the Washington Redskins figure to clinch the Eastern Division championship of the National Pro Football League by beating the injury and draft-riddled Brooklyn Dodgers today in Griffith Stadium at 2:30 p. m.

Due to incorrect reports of a sellout, the Redskin office had its dullest ticket-selling day of the season yesterday and as a result will place the last 2600 seats on sale at 9 o'clock this morning at the stadium. They are located in the east field stands, the bleachers and the knock-down seats in front of the bleachers.

The Redskins are leading the Eastern Division by a 2½-game margin with only the Pittsburgh Steelers holding a mathematical chance for the title. A victory or tie in either of the last two games for the 'Skins or a defeat or tie for the Steelers in their remaining three games will assure Washington of the championship playoff on December 13.

Dodgers Arrive

Coach Mike Getto, after daily attempts throughout the week to strengthen the slipping Dodgers, brought his 28-man squad here last night. Getto plucked Duce Keahey, a former G. W. tackle, from the waiver list, signed his assistant coach, Mike Nixon for the starting quarterback role and shifted lineman and backs at random trying to fill the gaps.

Brooklyn gave the Redskins an anxious afternoon in their first meeting of the season, finally losing 21-10 after leading twice during the first half but that game broke the Dodgers and they never recovered from the effects. The best they can do is tie for second place and that is unlikely.

Coach Ray Flaherty has been trying to make the Redskins forget their playoff date with the Bears and concentrate on the Dodgers but the way the Redskins have been rolling in compiling an eight-game winning streak they figure to beat the Dodgers, overconfident or not.

All Redskins Ready

For the first time since George Smith underwent an operation on his knee the Redskins will have every available man in uniform today, although Smith and Dick Todd, who was injured against the Giants last week, may not play.

Flaherty will start the club which has been clicking since the Cleveland Ram game. Sammy Baugh, who played one of his few 60-minute games last week since joining the pro ranks, will be flinging passes from the outset, with Ed Cifers, Bob Masterson, Ed Justice and Ray Hare as receivers. Andy Farkas, who scored two touchdowns against the Giants, will be at fullback, and that line will be the same with the people's choice, Wee Willie Wilkin, at left tackle and captaining the team.

The Redskins have no thought of backing into the title today, and Flaherty will shoot his best at the Dodgers as he goes for the Redskins' third title in six years in Washington and his seventh since taking over the coaching reins when the Redskins were Boston homed.

Nixon at Quarter

Nixon, nee Mike Nicksick, an All-American with Pitt who played two years with the Steelers, will take over the Dodgers' quarterbacking, replacing Wendell Butcher, who is injured. Butcher in turn succeeded Rhoten Shetley, now in the Army.

The Dodgers will have Pug Manders, Merlyn Condit, the league's second leading ground gainer and Passer Dean McAdams in the backfield while the best known of the Dodger linemen will be on the left side, Perry Schwartz at end and Bruiser Kinard at tackle.

North Carolina Avenges 1941 Beating by Virginia, 28-13

By the Associated Press

Charlottesville, Va., Nov. 21.—Turning loose their power in every period, the North Carolina Tarheels marched up and down spacious Scott Stadium here today to thrash the University of Virginia Cavaliers, 23 to 13, before a crowd of 6000.

The Tarheels had come up to Charlottesville with the idea of gaining sweet revenge for the 28-7 licking Bill Dudley and the Cavaliers dished out to them at Chapel Hill last Thanksgiving, and they got it right down to the very finish.

Fullback Bill Sigler started the Tarheels on their revenge journey with the game only a minute old. Sigler took the ball from Halfback Joe Austin on a reverse, drilled off tackle and tore down the side lines for 61 yards to Virginia's 4. In two plays Sigler completed the job, driving over from the 1-yard line. Mike Cooke booted the ball for the extra point and the Tarheels led, 7-0.

After that tall Bob Heymann pounced on the pigskin in the end zone for another Carolina score after Eddie Kreick let a punt get away from him. With seconds remaining in the third period Johnny Pecora sliced around end for 13 yards and 6 more points. Cooke converted after both scores. Sophomore Bill Myers finished the Carolina scoring with a neat 14-yard sprint midway in the final chapter, and this time Jack Hussey made the extra point.

Virginia's tallies came in the second and fourth stanzas, both touchdowns being scored on passes from George Grimes to Billy Hill.

Irish Star Sets New Mark In NCAA Run

By the Associated Press

East Lansing, Mich., Nov. 21.—Howard Hunter, Notre Dame's durable distance runner, whipped a field of 64 in the National Collegiate Athletic Association's fifth annual cross-country run here today and sliced 14.1 seconds off the meet record even though he strayed from the course at one point.

For the first time in the history of the run, there was a tie for the team title. Indiana University, Western Conference champion, and Penn State College, runner-up to Rhode Island State for the I. C. A. A. A. championship, deadlocked at 57 points. Rhode Island State, 1941 N. C. A. A. winner, was third with 79.

Hunter's time of 20 minutes 18 seconds for the four-mile course broke the record of 20:32.1 established a year ago by Frederick Wilt of Indiana, who was ineligible for this year's race. Hunter trailed Wilt to the finish in 1941.

Led All the Way

Today Hunter led all the way, except at the mile and a half mark when he took a wrong turn and lost an estimated 15 seconds before returning to the course. Earl Mitchell, Indiana's Western Conference individual champion, seized the lead at that point but failed to hold it as the fast-striding Hunter, intent on making up the lost time, overhauled him in about 300 yards.

Mitchell finished in second place, nearly 300 yards behind the Notre Dame winner, and another 150 yards back was Leroy Schwartzkopf of Yale. Bob Nichols, of the defending champion Rhode Island State team, was fourth, and behind him was Penn State's first finisher, Norman Gordon.

The score bounced to 20-0 before the half. To put it there, Army went 53 yards in seven blasts, including a nice end around play featuring Les Salzer. Anderson climaxed this march by passing to Woods in the end zone.

A pulverizing Army ground attack advanced the count to 27 to 0 late in the third. Taking over on the Army 44 after Bob Perina's kick, Army scored in seven plays, with Anderson Woods and Jim Kelleher, another transfer from the Naval Academy, lugging the ball. Woods pounded over from the four.

The next touchdown was Princeton's. John Douglas, reserve center, recovered an Army fumble on Princeton's 39 shortly after the opening of the fourth period. Perina passed to Capt. Dick Schmon on Army's 37, to put Princeton in Army dirt for the first time since the opening minutes of the game, when another recovered fumble got them there. John Heath now shot a southpaw pass to Weston Army's 18, then Perina passed to Dick West, who was dumped on the one. Bob Sandback carried it over, and kicked the extra point.

tried to match that in the third period but Paul Weber's kick sailed all of 7 yards before going out.

George Washington's head cheerleader, Nick Lakas, was a little overoptimistic when he growled over the loud speaker at the Colonial cheering section in the first half—"If you people open your mouths we might win this game." The stands liked his use of the word "might" . . . Absent from the Hoyas' last game of the season was Joe Gardner, their new graduate manager of athletics, who spent the day peeking through a glass door in a Philadelphia hospital . . . Object of his attention was a 6-pound, 14-ounce son presented him Thursday by Mrs. Gardner, the former Elva Flynn of the Quaker City.

Washington lineup provided precisely the added impetus required to end that losing streak.

Twenty-one-year-old Al "Ripper" Ritson also came in for his share of cheers as he made two of the Lions' goals and was given an official assist on a third. With Leo Richard and Jimmy Jamieson, boyish-looking Ritson has been in top notch form since the combination formed into an offensive line two weeks ago.

The Lions pulled out their Sunday punches early in the first period as Al Ritson took the puck on his own defense line and proceeded all the way to the Buffalo net for a goal after only 1:35 had elapsed. Assists were given officially to the remainder of the line, Jamieson and Richards, but most of the spectators figured that it was just one on general principles.

Only some brilliant saves by Goalie Ceryance—the same brand of net minding that the Lions had such difficulty in solving when he was serving in a similar capacity for the Hershey Bears last Wednesday night—kept the score from mounting in the Bisons' favor as the period progressed. On one Buffalo rush, Ceryance skidded to the right of the net, leaving it completely unguarded for a fraction of a second and a quick shot by Max Bennet missed by a narrow margin. That, however, was the only time during the period that Ceryance caused a bad moment for Washington followers.

The visitors' defense led by fleet-footed Frank Beisler, found the secret of stopping the Lions in the second period and ladyluck temporarily transferred to the Bisons' bailiwick. Dede Klein came through with two scores, the first at 1:48 and the second at 14:47 to tie the score at 2-all.

on the Colonial 18. A rush and pass play cost the Hoyas 1 yard, but then Bill McLaughlin, another senior, tore off left tackle, swung wide and went the 19 yards easily. Whitey Erickson barely got the first of his three placements through the posts.

Until midway of the third period nothing happened. Nothing, that is, except some terrifically uninteresting seesawing. G. W. moved up to Georgetown's 27 once when a 21-yard pass, Jimmy Graham to Pete Labukas, clicked. Still nothing happened. Georgetown, in turn, reached its foe's 1-yard line as the first half came to an end, but there the timer stopped it. The clock still showed 10 seconds of play when the official scooped up the ball, indicating the intermission.

Finally the Hoyas found strength enough to clinch matters. Taking Paul Weber's kick from back of his own 8-yard line, Dornfeld romped back to the G. W. 43. Eddie Agnew and Barrett had a shot each at the line, then Dornfeld broke through center for 18 yards to the Colonial 3, where he was dropped by Joe Bernot.

Three straight times Agnew, scrappy quarterback of the Hoyas, tried to sneak through center for the score but fell short. The ball was inches away from pay dirt when Barrett took over on fourth down and plunged far into the end zone.

The final touchdown was the most spectacular of the dull afternoon. It came on the only pass the Hoyas completed in the second half—to their own players anyway—and immediately after Agnew had picked Seno's pass out of the air on his own 40 and sidestepped to the G. W. 35.

Dornfeld, out of play the last two games with a cut leg, dropped back to almost midfield and hurled as Colonials swarmed all over him. Barrett was running at top speed on the 10-yard line when he took the ball over his shoulder. He pulled away from the clutching hands of Bernot and stepped into the end zone.

In taking their fourteenth victory in the 15 renewals of the rivalry—it got a scoreless tie in 1902—Georgetown managed for a mere 12-8 margin in first downs. It gained 153 yards rushing, however, to the Colonials' 42. George Washington's only reason for cheering was the fact it wasn't beaten as bad as last year, when the score was 25-0.

Nobody was bragging about anything, though.

Terrors Whip Coast Guard

By the Associated Press

Westminster, Md., Nov. 21.—The Green Terrors of Western Maryland completely outclassed the Coast Guard eleven from Curtis Bay today to ring up a 28-0 victory.

A crowd estimated at 1200 saw the contest, highlighted by the passing of Manny Kaplan, Terror quarterback, and the running of Left Halfback Art O'Keefe, who scored two of the touchdowns. One of O'Keefe's tallies came on a 55-yard gallop through left tackle.

The game was just four minutes old when the final result became apparent. After that brief span, Kaplan tossed a 27-yard pass to Paul Mendell for a touchdown.

Is This an Indicator Of What's to Come?

Baltimore, Nov. 21 (AP).—Perhaps it means something and perhaps it doesn't, but the "Navy" beat the "Army" 2-0 today—at field hockey. Of course, they weren't real service teams. The girls at Goucher College thought it up, and gave the game all the trimmings—"goat," "mule" and everything.

Johns Hopkins Beaten, 29-6

By the Associated Press

Philadelphia, Nov. 21.—Drexel Tech romped to a 20-6 triumph over Johns Hopkins here today, after the Baltimore gridders had made the going close in the early minutes of play.

Drexel tallied first when Herb Beattie raced 62 yards for a touchdown and Willie Burrowes added the extra point. Two plays later Jimmy Russell sprinted 75 yards on an end run but Ray Alonzo's kick for the seventh point failed.

Drexel moved to a comfortable margin in the second session, chalking up touchdowns on a 5-yard pass from Bob Clyde to Joe Greene and a 7-yard end run by Craig Smith. Burrowes made good his first placement, missed the second. A safety added to the count when Stoll was tackled behind his goal by Marshall Austin.

On the Line

With CONSIDINE

CONSIDINE

New York, Nov. 21.—Don Hutson, who plays here tomorrow against the New York Giants, has achieved a niche in his spot which few men ever attain. Nobody knocks him.

Just as the greatest sluggers in baseball used to look up to Babe Ruth as something beyond envy, just as the owners of great thoroughbreds always placed Man o' War in a special class, just as great golfers bowed to Bobby Jones and great tennis players to Bill Tilden, and just as all heavyweights learned to regard Joe Louis as something apart from the mob, the great football ends of this era acknowledge Hutson as the absolute last word.

Perry Schwartz, the Dodger end who was good enough to make All-America and later was named as the opposite wingman to Hutson on several all-star pro teams, told us recently that he never approached Hutson's mastery on the best day he, Schwartz, ever had. He said it completely without jealousy. It was a simple statement of fact, heartily indorsed by all the fine ends in the pro league. Hutson is their pride, never their despair.

Hutson holds more records than any other performer in the National Football League. Since he joined the Packers, after running wild for Alabama in the 1935 Rose Bowl game, Don has nearly always topped the lot in offensive play. This year he is more of a menace than ever. He has scored 14 touchdowns and gained 1032 yards.

The next closest man to him in the matter of scoring touchdowns is Ray McLean of the Bears, who has scored only six. The next closest mark to Hutson's 1032 yards gained with passes is teammate Andy Uram's modest 410. The leading ground gainer in the league, in rushes from scrimmage, is Bill Dudley with 591 yards, which gives you some idea of what a scourge Hutson is and how far he stands apart from his peers.

He has a fine passer, of course. Cecil Isbell is topped only by Sammy Baugh, who must also be classed with Hutson as an unapproachable figure in sport. But you'll notice that when Hutson is involved in a touchdown play you don't hear much about the man who threw the ball. You hear about the man who caught it. At Washington it is just the reverse. Baugh gets the credit for the touchdown. The man who catches Sam's fiery pitch in the end zone, or catches it in the field and runs the rest of the way, has a tough time getting mentioned in anything except the agate summaries, where he gets equal billing with the field judge.

The answer to that is the men themselves. Hutson and Baugh have risen above the rest of the touchdown machinery. Nobody begrudges them their fame or their skill. That's a tribute in a game as highly competitive and as deep-rootedly mercenary as pro football. They make more in one game than their obscure, but necessary cohorts make in four or five games.

But pros want Hutson and Baugh to make money, just as every ball player we ever knew was tickled when Jake Ruppert began raising Babe's salary up to the zenith of $80,000. Babe's $80,000 meant that a lot of guys named Joe would get $7500 instead of $4500. Babe's dough set an example that raised the living standards of the sport. The same thing is happening in the football league.

Hutson's unparalleled fortes are his deception, his change of pace and direction and the eyes he wears in the back of his helmet. All teams build special defenses to trap him. All teams put two men on him, but he still gets away. He has a genius for running along easily with his back turned to Isbell, and then stopping, cutting to his right or left, or sprinting out in front just in time to whirl around, take a quick look and catch the ball.

'S wonnerful!

Willie Pep, who has made an Algeresque rise from Hartford bootblack to the featherweight title, looks like he'll keep Mike Jacobs worried about that $25,000 a year income ceiling for a long time to come. Hartford fans filled the Garden to see Willie the challenger, now he's Willie the champ, and a good rough citizen who should rule the roost for a long time to come.

Maryland Has Time Beating Washington and Lee, 32-28

long pass from Babcock and his conversion brought the score to 21-32 with less than three minutes to play, but at that it seemed Washington and Lee was just bringing the score to respectable proportions.

Tommy Mont came right back with passes for the Terps but Jay Cook intercepted for the Generals and they started off again. Russell made a beautiful catch of a 27-yard pass from Babcock to the Maryland 39 but here Bob James came in to toss Harry Harner for a 15-yard loss. Harner passed to Norman to regain the 15 yards, however, and then Dick Working threw a 40-yard pass to Harry Baugher who took it over his shoulder on the dead run with his intended coverers, Andy Schnebly and Lou Chacos, far behind. Russell converted again and now it was 32-28, with less than a minute to go.

Kick Works

Washington and Lee tried an on-side kick and it worked, with Baugher recovering the ball on the Maryland 43. Seconds to go now and the same long pass-catch combination of Working and Baugher tried again, for the limit, but the pass was broken up and the final gun saved Maryland's seventh victory in nine games.

The Generals, who lost eight of nine games for the year, scored more points today than against any team they played all season, and more than they scored for the first five games of the year. Hampden-Sydney was their only victim until the Maryland reserves almost undid what their Old Line varsity had started.

The first three times Maryland had the ball in the first period they scored. Washington and Lee looked to be all its record implied as they made pitiful attempts to stop the touchdown - bound Terps. Hubert Werner made 28 yards off tackle to score after a 61-yard drive in the first three minutes. Jack Wright made a yard and touchdown after a 32-yard drive. Tommy Mont converted twice as the Terps scored every five minutes and looked as though they could maintain the pace all day.

Maryland's second-stringers gave the Generals their first score, early in the second period. Ray Norman of the Generals blocked George Barnes' kick and recovered on the Maryland 6. Three bucks at the Maryland line gained naught but on fourth down Working passed to Norman in the corner of the end zone and Washington and Lee had scored, which was something.

Tommy Mont, Maryland's All-Conference quarterback candidate, tossed the first of his two touchdown passes of the day to Jack Gilmore, a 27-yard play late in the second period and the Terps regained their three-touchdown lead. Mont, incidentally, completed 14 of 21 passes for the day for 197 yards, several of them behind the line passes which produced no gain.

Russell, a 165-pound halfback from Portsmouth, Ohio, gave the Generals something to live for in the early moments of the third period. He happened to be around when Werner was hit hard on the 25-yard line and the fumbled ball fell into Russell's hands. He scooted past the surprised Terps and with Elmer Rigby in futile chase went 75 yards for the touchdown and then added the extra point.

Maryland took a 26-14 lead in the fourth period and added 6 more when Mont passed to Meier for 15 yards and a touchdown, another wide pass play which left the Maryland receiver all alone as he galloped for the score. Mont then missed the point after for the third time in five attempts.

That left Maryland comfortably ahead, 32-14, with six minutes to play but comfortable was not the word for their lead a little later on when the aroused Lexington club connected for the two long, desperate passes in a row for touchdowns and were firing at another when Referee Dutch Eberts had the final say with his trigger finger.

Maryland piled up 11 first downs to four and 253 yards on the ground to 34 for the Generals.

Unbeaten Ga. Tech Forced to Rally to Beat Florida, 20-7

'Gators Hold Engineers in Early Play

Second-Half Battle Brings Victory to Yellow Jackets; Freshman Stars

By the Associated Press

Atlanta, Nov. 21. — Georgia Tech's Yellow Jackets put in a strong bid for national honors today by coming back from a dismal start to whip Florida, 20-7, for their ninth successive victory as Georgia tumbled stunningly.

The undefeated-untied Tech's, rallying around Southpaw Freshman Clint Castleberry and another little back, Davey Eldredge, overpowered underdog Florida's stubbornness with a determined attack in the second half. About 15,000 fans saw the Techs march to within one game of a perfect season and a postseason bowl bid. They seemed destined to rise to No. 1 rating in the national poll.

Their last game sends them against newly-beaten Georgia next week. The Georgia Bulldogs, rated No. 1 in Associated Press rankings, were beaten today by Auburn in the season's most stunning upset, 27-13.

Second Team Opens

Georgia Tech, opening with second stringers and plainly pointing ahead to Georgia, was outplayed through most of the first half. The Engineers put together only one drive before the intermission, converting it into a 7-0 lead that enabled them to reach the half all-even at 7-7. Then, with the regulars starting the second half, the Techs proceeded to clip off a touchdown in each of the last two quarters against an often-beaten Florida eleven.

McAfee Points Fliers to Victory

Pensacola, Fla., Nov. 21 (AP).—George McAfee, Jacksonville Navy's great triple threat back, provided the difference as the fliers defeated Pensacola Navy's Gosling's 16 to 10 before 4000 fans at Air Station Field today.

The Jacksonville team put over two touchdowns in the third quarter to go with a field goal scored in the final moments of the first half.

Pensacola, which took a short lived lead late in the second quarter on a field goal, came back with a touchdown drive one minute before the game ended.

Cloudbusters Rally To Stop W. and M., 14-0

By the Associated Press

Williamsburg, Va., Nov. 21.—Stopped cold for three mauling periods, the North Carolina Naval Preflight eleven exploded a pulverizing attack in the final quarter today to conquer a battling but outmanned William and Mary football team, 14 to 0, before 10,000 spectators. It was the first loss of the season for William and Mary.

The Carolina Cloudbusters, with a lineup of former college and pro stars which read like a copy of football who's who, were unable to get past the Indian 22-yard line before the decisive fourth period. William and Mary's best offensive spurt bogged on the naval cadets' 21 in the third quarter.

Morte Landsberg, hard-running back who learned his football at Cornell, scored midway in the final period on a deceptive double reverse which sprang him loose for a 16-yard jaunt around his left end.

A few minutes later Walter Zwiezynski, former Lafayette star who had done most of the Cloudbusters' gaining earlier in the game, burst over center from the 10. Hayward Sanford, former Alabama end, converted after both touchdowns.

Earlier in the same quarter, the Carolina Cadets battered their way over the tiring W. and M. squad, which before this contest had been ranked as the Nation's No. 1 club on defense, from their own 25 to the 3.

Ole Miss Bows To Miss. State In Final Half

State College, Miss., Nov. 21.—After being held 7-7 at the half, Mississippi State broke loose in a wild display of power and led by the great Blondy Black, crushed the University of Mississippi Rebels, 34 to 13, here today before 18,000.

Black was the shining star of the game but was pushed for these honors by a 165-pound freshman, Sonny Boy Shelby of the University, who kep tthe losers very much in the ball game until the fourth quarter deluge.

Black, a 9.6 seconds 100-yard dash man, repeated his long run for a touchdown performance of last Saturday by running a kick-off back 95 yards to score. Last week he ran 97 from a fake kick formation. Black scored two other touchdowns, both from the 1-yard line.

Vanderbilt Bows, 27-7, To Alabama

By the Associated Press

Birmingham, Ala., Nov. 21.—Alabama turned on the power here today to win a convincing 27-to-7 victory over the hard-fighting Vanderbilt Commodores before 17,000 fans.

The winners drove 80 yards for their first score, the first time they got their hands on the ball, with Johnny August, fleet sophomore from Shadyside, Ohio, providing the spark and making the touchdown on a 10-yard burst at right end.

Their next two counters culminated marches of 26 and 58 yards in the second and third periods. And their final tally was scored on a 50-yard run by Substitute Center Bill Baughman, who gathered in a flat pass from Burns and ran unmolested across the goal line.

Vandy came charging back and Art Rebrovich passed and ran the Commodores from their 17 to the 'Bama 16, where the Tide dug in and took the ball. The score was delayed only a few minutes, however, as Rebrovich got back to the Tide 39, with the ensuing punt, and a pass and two penalties against Alabama took it to the 5, where McDavid plunged to the 1, and Jack Jenkins drove over on his third try.

Alabama had two additional golden scoring opportunities, but the Vandy line, headed by Centers Fred Holder and Charlie Hoover, stopped the running attack to take the ball on downs, each time on the 1-yard line.

The Tide's second touchdown was set up by August's 24-yard return of a punt which he gathered in at midfield. Craft and August drove to the 14, and Craft hammered at the line twice more for 9. Bobby Tom Jenkins made it first down on the Commodore 3, and then plunged over on third down.

The third Tide marker, covering 58 yards, featured August's passes.

Duke Catches State In Slump, Wins 47-0

By the Associated Press

Durham, N. C., Nov. 21.—Duke, at its best, caught N. C. State at its worst here today, and when the ensuing slaughter had ended the Blue Devils had won, 47-0.

A crowd of 15,000 had expected a close fight, but after a few minutes they settled into their seats and watched the home team romp.

The alert Duke team, with power on the ground and talent in the air, took advantage of every break—and the point-thirsty Wolfpack provided plenty of breaks. Duke scored once in the first period, twice in the second, thrice in the third and tapered off with a lone touchdown in the fourth.

The veteran Fullback Tom Davis scored four touchdowns, three on short line smashes and one on a colorful 41-yard run. In addition, he hit the middle of the line repeatedly for substantial gains. Bob Gantt, hefty end, place-kicked five of seven extra-point attempts.

Duke had 16 first downs and a rushing net of 236 yards. The Wolfpack racked up six first downs, but wound up with a net loss of 1 yard rushing. The Blue Devils completed 7 of 15 passes for 107 yards, and State completed 9 of 26 throws for 97 yards. Duke intercepted five passes, Al Hoover running back one interception 42 yards for a touchdown.

The victory gave Duke a half interest with the University of North Carolina for the State championship.

Mountaineers Beaten, 7 to 0, By Mich. State

By the Associated Press

East Lansing, Mich., Nov. 21.—A rugged Michigan State College eleven tumbled the Mountaineers of West Virginia, 7-0, in a defensive football battle before 6000 fans at Maclin Field today.

A Mountaineer fumble midway in the first period paved the way for a 60-yard Michigan State drive and the game's only touchdown. After West Virginia valiantly held the Spartans for three downs on the one, Fullback Morgan Gingrass of State slashed over to score.

Michigan State's flashy one-two punch—Halfback Dick Kieppeo and Fullback Gingrass—did a thorough job of denting the Mountaineer defenses. Gingrass tore off 23 yards to West Virginia's 30 to start State's scoring drive, and then banged 17 to the Mountaineer 7 to all but clinch the touchdown.

Halfback Wally Pawlowski, benched three weeks by a knee injury, made a brief appearance to boot the extra point.

Miami Edges South Carolina

By the Associated Press

Miami, Fla., Nov. 21.—Miami handed South Carolina a 13-6 defeat before 9774 spectators today in a football game which wasn't safely in the bag until the final whistle.

It was the widest margin obtained by either team in a six-game series featured by such scores as 6-3, 3-0, 7-6 and 7-2 and the victory was Miami's second over the Gamecocks.

The South Carolinians, who have managed to win one game all year, had a slight edge in statistics, but Miami made good two long distance scoring plays to triumph.

The home team jumped to a lead midway of the first period, when the lightning-fast Walter Watt breezed around left end on a weak side reverse—a play which has been a Miami ace in the hole all season—and outran the defenders all the way across the goal, 54 yards away.

Tennessee Brushes Kentucky Aside, 26-0

By the Associated Press

Knoxville, Tenn., Nov. 21.—Tennessee's rugged Volunteers brushed aside Kentucky's impotent Wildcats to enhance their postseason bowl chances today with a convincing 26-to-0 triumph before 20,000 fans.

The largest home crowd of the season saw Coach John Barnhill's crushing Vols roll up a 20-to-0 halftime score in the traditional homecoming, then relaxed as Tennessee played defensively during the last two quarters.

Kentucky, crippled by the absence of ace Passer Phil Cutchin, loosened only one drive which bogged on Tennessee's 19-yard line. Three Wildcats were carried from the field following Tennessee plays, including Captain-Center Charlie Walker.

Third and fourth stringers held Kentucky in check in the last half. These Tennessee substitutes contented themselves with but one touchdown, Freshman End Jim Powell snagging a long pass from Walter Slater and racing 25 yards for the marker.

Tennessee's first touchdown came midway the opening period after a Kentucky punt went out of bounds on the Wildcat 27. Bobby Cifers, triple-theater, smacked left end for the score and Charlie Mitchell kicked the point after.

N. Carolina Navy, Iowa Seahawks Game Called Off

By the Associated Press

Chapel Hill, N. C., Nov. 21.—Comdr. O. O. Kessing of the North Carolina Naval Preflight School said today that the football game between the Preflight Cloudbusters and the Iowa Naval Preflight School, scheduled for Chapel Hill December 12, had been canceled because of transportation difficulties.

Commander Kessing said that coaches of the two teams had considered canceling the game for the past several weeks, during which time efforts had been made to work out transportation problems.

The preflight school here originally had 2 home games booked in a 12-game schedule. Canceling of the Iowa Naval Preflight game leaves only the game with Colgate December 5 to be played in the University of North Carolina's Kenan Stadium.

Hamp.-Sydney Earns 6-6 Tie

By the Associated Press

Hampden Sydney, Va., Nov. 21.—The Hampden Sydney Tigers outgained the favored Randolph-Macon Yellow Jackets today to tie their 50-year-old rivals 6-6 in the last game of the season for both teams.

A Tiger fumble on the 5-yard line gave the Jackets their touchdown setup late in the first quarter. Hampden Sydney came back in the closing period to tie up the contest for the State Little Four championship.

Walter Sprye, out for three quarters because of a leg injury, passed 30 yards to Bob Mistels, sub end, for Hampden Sydney's score. Houtz's running had advanced the ball to the Jackets' 30 when Sprye entered the game.

On a fake reverse, Sprye hurled to Mistels, who caught the ball over the goal. The try for extra point by Jess Hawley, freshman, was wide.

Randolph-Macon scored in the first after Eddie Campbell, Tiger freshman back, fumbled in attempting to run from his own 10 out of a fake kick formation. "Snag" Nesbit, Jacket guard, recovered the ball. The Tigers held twice, but on the next play Ike Kovar handed the ball to Jimmy Camp, who reversed to the left and fell across the goal. Paul Isenberg's kick for the extra point was blocked by John Sivell, Tiger tackle.

Clemson Tops Furman, 12-7

By the Associated Press

Clemson, S. C., Nov. 21.—Clemson defeated Furman, 12 to 7, today by marching 65 yards and later capitalizing on a fourth-quarter Furman lateral that backfired. A crowd of 12,000 saw the game.

Clemson ushered Marion (Butch) Butler over the goal line within three minutes of the kick-off, but failure to convert the extra point enabled Furman early in the fourth period to take a 7-to-6 lead after a 31-yard march that ended with Paul Sizemore catching a 25-yard touchdown pass from Dewey Proctor.

Less than three minutes after the Tigers had convetred a dreary-looking homecoming of alumni into a victorious one as Sophomore Monty Byers' fourth down, a 33-yard flat pass to Sophomore End Chip Clark, turned the trick.

Manhattan Routed, 28 to 0, By Holy Cross

By the United Press

Worcester, Mass., Nov. 21.—Holy Cross easily defeated Manhattan College 28 to 0 on water-soaked Fitton Field today before 4000 spectators to keep its record clear of a defeat in their twelfth contest with each other.

Holy Cross struck in the second period after being held scoreless in the first quarter by climaxing power drives of 88 and 71 yards with touchdowns by Johnny Bezemes and Capt. Ed Murphy.

Bob Sullivan's 38-yard thrust that started through center and which was stopped by Frank Kiesecker's last ditch tackle from behind a 22-yard pass from Johnny Grigas to Bezemes to Manhattan's 4, set the stage for Bezemes' 4-yard sweep around his right end. Bezemes threw a 20-yard aerial to Murphy who continued 20 more into the end zone for the second touchdown.

Doublrab, Ridden by Gilbert, Takes $5000 Bowie Handicap

Attendance, Betting Show Good Gain

Flaught Finishes Second, Star Copy Is Third; Winner Returns $6.80

By Walter Haight

A Staff Correspondent

Bowie, Md., Nov. 21.—Doublrab, owned by Mrs. Tilyou Christopher of Miami, Fla., was impressive here this afternoon by leading every jump but the first two or three to win the $5000 added Prince Georges Autumn Handicap. Acnowledged one of the best sprinters in the country, the 4-year-old son of Sherab and Double Shamrock stuck to his running guns today to win by a half length. Mrs. E. D. Jacobs' Flaught was second, four lengths ahead of H. P. Metcalf's Star Copy.

Considering transportation difficulties, Bowie went to town today. The good nine-race program drew a crowd of 9000 and betting was over the half-million mark for the first time since the meeting began.

Jockey Johnny Gilbert, who has been riding in sensational form, had the mount on Doublrab and this was one of the reasons the crowd swung away from Star Copy, winner of the Lynch Memorial Handicap, to install Doublrab a light favorite in the field of eight. Doublrab had faltered in that race to be beaten two lengths by Star Copy.

Pays $6.80 Price

The winner was clocked in 1:47 for the mile and a sixteenth over a fast (for Bowie) track. He paid $6.80 to win, $4.10 to place and $2.80 to show. His time was the fourth fastest since the distance was reduced from a mile and an eighth to the present route in 1928.

If ever a jockey shared honors with a horse in a race, Gilbert deserves half the credit for Doublrab's victory. The horse did not break any too well. Gilbert, however, hustled him and he was in front banking the clubhouse turn. Navy, representing Mrs. E. D. Sowers of Washington, went up on the outside of Doublrab approaching the back stretch. Gilbert then did a masterful job of rating the frontrunner.

Star Copy was in the first flight and Jockey Clingman steadied him in fourth position when he was unable to outrun Doublrab and Navy. Leaving the back stretch, Navy began to tire. Flaught then moved to serious contention and Clingman sent Star Copy to the outside. Star Copy made a bold move nearing the stretch and Flaught came along with the filly.

At this point, Gilbert began to let out on Doublrab. The colt responded and opened a length lead. In the stretch, Star Copy began to falter but Flaught came on. Gilbert by this time was working for all he was worth on Doublrab. With some 10 yards to go, Doublrab began to falter and Flaught came on with a bold rush to be wearing him down at the end.

Doublrab, despite his quitting habits, has been a model of consistency this year. Today's race was his twenty-third start of 1942, his tenth victory and the twenty-seventh time he has been in the money. He picked up $4350 in earnings to make his year's total a healthy $56,400.

A. J. Sackett's Richmond, fifth to Doublrab in the Burch Memorial here had too much speed for a group of Class C sprinters and won the seventh race, the Godspeed Handicap, the day's secondary feature.

Mose Brown Fined; Sister Battles as Fighter Holds Gun

By the Associated Press

McKeesport, Pa., Nov. 21.—Mose Brown, McKeesport, Negro light heavyweight contender, was held for court under $1000 bond yesterday on a charge of pointing a gun at 10 patrons of a tavern.

Witnesses testified that Brown, after a quarrel with an unidentified woman, said:

"I can't fight you but my sister will lick you."

Then, Magistrate James Toohey was told, Brown held the patrons at bay with the gun while his sister, Ellen, and the woman "battled it out."

Ellen Brown was fined $10 and costs on a charge of disorderly conduct. A man testified she hit him with a beer bottle when he attempted to intervene.

Boston College Crushes Boston U. Before 5000 Fans, 37-0

4th-Period Tallies Gained By Reserves

Mike Holovak Stars For Eagles; Terriers Put Up Game Battle; Lucas Shines

By the United Press

Boston, Nov. 21.—Boston College continued on its bowlward way, today by crushing an inspired Boston University eleven, 37-0 at Fenway Park before a small crowd of 5000 wet and chilly fans.

Boston University's Terriers, playing their last game of the season, held their mighty intracity rivals to one touchdown per period until the final quarter, when they were routed by fresh reserves who piled up three more touchdowns.

Perhaps single individual honors fell to Halfback Mike Holovak, who scored once, made the only conversion and carried the majority of the time that the varsity was on the slippery field.

Only less impressive was the passing of Reserve Back Carl Lucas, who pitched two aerials—one for 60 yards, another for 45 yards—that brought scores.

Boston University crossed midfield but twice, its best effort reaching the enemy 40 on a penalty. However, its grim defensive tactics forced the Boston College varsity to its utmost until the closing minutes.

Great Lakes Team Blanks Illini, 6 to 0

By the Associated Press

Champaign, Ill., Nov. 21.—Great Lakes scored its fifth straight shutout victory today, downing Illinois, 6 to 0, before a crowd of 10,856. It was the first time this year the Illini have failed to cross their opponents' goal line.

The Sailors made their lone touchdown in the third period when Bob Sweigler, former Minnesota fullback, plunged over from the 1-yard line after his former Gopher teammate, Halfback Bruce Smith, had set up the play with a brilliant 41-yard sprint through the Illini secondary.

The rest of the time the powerful Sailors romped frequently through the Illinois line, compiling 269 yards by rushing. But when the pressure was too great the Illini doggedly stopped Great Lakes.

Dartmouth Wallops Governali and Co.

By the Associated Press

New York, Nov. 21.—Dartmouth's Indians walloped the Columbia Lions, 26-13, today in the last game of the year for both teams before 10,000 at Baker Field, presenting a fitting farewell present to their coach, Tuss McLaughry, who expects to be in the armed services before another football season.

Paul Governali, as fine a passer as ever carried an entire team on his shoulders, tossed Columbia to two touchdowns but he couldn't plug the holes in the leaky Lion forward wall, which let the Indians sift through for two markers in each of the second and the fourth periods.

Playing the last game of his varsity career, Governali tied the national collegiate record of 19 touchdowns passes in a season, set by Davey O'Brien of Texas Christian in 1938. He completed 11 of 19 passes for 224 yards, missing by only 15 yards the season record of 1547 yards held by O'Brien and Bud Schwenk of Washington at St. Louis.

But much of the Columbia ace's passing thunder was stolen by young Jacie Sayers, a left-handed freshman who set up three of the Dartmouth touchdowns with his accurate heaves.

The Indians scored first in the second quarter when Maurice Dampier intercepted one of Governali's tosses and lugged it 9 yards to the Columbia 38. Sayers rifled a long pass which John Monaham caught with a desperate dive that landed him on the 4. Two smashes brought 3 yards before George Pulliam cracked the middle for the score. Ed Kast's kick for point was blocked.

Governali returned the following kickoff 11 yards to his 20 and on the first play he tossed a long pass to Germann, who outran two defenders and hustled to the tying touchdown. The play carried 76 yards, divided evenly between the pass and the run. Leno Ferrarini's try for the point was wide.

Only eight seconds of the first half remained when Dartmouth scored its second touchdown, cashing in on Roger Antaya's perfect steal of the ball from Bruce Gehrke the Columbia 45.

The Governali-to-Germann combination clicked in the third period for a touchdown from 57 yards out.

The score remained deadlocked until the fourth period, when Douglas put the Lions in the hole by punting out on the 3-yard line. The return kick was only to 35 and Sayers immediately pitched 21 yards to Douglas to the 14. From there it took the chunky fullback only three tries to get a touchdown.

New Brunswick, N. J., Nov. 21.—Syracuse University's football eleven bounced back from three successive defeats to eke out a 12-to-7 victory over an underdog Rutgers University team today before a crowd of 5000 in Rutgers Stadium.

It was the season's finale for both squads and gave the New Yorkers their sixth victory in a series of seven with the Scarlet. One game ended in a tie.

The heavily favored Syracuse team was played to a scoreless stand-off in the first half by the hard-fighting Rutgers team and then had to come from behind in the final quarter to achieve its victory.

Kansas State Wins, 7-6, Over Iowa State

By the Associated Press

Manhattan, Kans., Nov. 21.—The Kansas State College Wildcats, wallowing in the mire of eight straight drubbings, made a first-quarter touchdown stand up for 53 minutes today as they dealt out a stunning 7-to-6 upset to a favored Iowa State football team.

A slim crowd of 2200 witnessed the thrill-packed Big Six contest which left the two contestants tied with Kansas for fourth place in the conference.

The Wildcats scored on a 56-yard march the first time they got possession of the ball in the initial period. Taking a short punt on the Cyclone 44, Kansas State moved to the Iowa State 7 on line lunges by Earl Williams, Bill Quick and Johnnie Bortka, and two offside penalties. Quick then lofted a pass into the end zone. George Gast, Cyclone halfback, tipped the ball and Mike Vargon, star sophomore wingman, plucked it out of the air to come down with the score.

Williams' Kick Wins

Williams, the place-kick specialist, who missed both extra point tries last year to give Iowa State a 12-to-12 tie, calmly split the uprights for what was to be become the all-important point.

Indiana Downs Purdue, 20-0, And Takes Old Oaken Bucket

Hoosier Backs Line Up to Their Billing In Routing Boilermakers Before 20,000

By the Associated Press

Lafayette, Ind., Nov. 21.—Indiana University's powerful backfield turned out to be just that today and for the first time the Hoosiers won the old oaken bucket three years in a row by defeating Purdue, 20 to 0, before a chilled crowd of 20,000 fans.

As a matter of fact, it was a dull game as far as Indiana-Purdue games are concerned. The Crimson-shirted Hoosiers never let the game get out of control from the time Hugh (Knocky) McKinnis punched over for the first touchdown in the second period.

Only once were they threatened and that was in the third period when Southpaw Tony Berto helped pitch the Boilermakers to the Indiana 16. A missed signal which cost 16 yards and a bad pass ended the threat, however.

The final quarter was all Indiana's. Lou Saban ran 20 yards off right tackle for the second Hoosier touchdown and then McKinnis drove over from the 1-yard line for the other marker.

It was Indiana's sixth victory in nine games this fall and gave Purdue a season record of eight losses against only a triumph over Northwestern.

Detroit Bows To Arkansas In Upset, 14-7

By the Associated Press

Detroit, Nov. 21.—The downtrodden Arkansas Razorbacks, spotting the University of Detroit football team a first-period touchdown, came from behind spectacularly to achieve a 14-to-7 upset triumph in an intersectional game today before a slim crowd of 5153 spectators.

Once-beaten Detroit advanced 49 yards for an early touchdown, Elmer (Tippy) Madarik passing the final 8 yards to End Charley Ruth, but the Razorbacks roared back in the third period to tie it up when End Virgil Johnson seized upon a Detroit fumble in the end zone.

Then with six minutes remaining, Arkansas clinched victory on a 34-yard touchdown march, with Bob Fortes smashing over from the 2-yard line.

The victory, ending a three-game losing streak, was Arkansas' third against six defeats. Detroit now has won five and lost two.

The Razorbacks, crushing a defense that had yielded only two touchdowns in six games, deserved everything they got. Key men in both touchdown advances were Fortes, a hard driving 200-pound halfback, and speedy Wayne Marshall.

Marshall's interception of Madarik's pass on the fourth play of the third period preceded a 57-yard march in 12 plays, that ended at Detroit's one, where the home forces staged a successful goal-line stand. On the second play Henry Piper, standing in his end zone to punt, fumbled the pass from center and Johnson pounced on it. Felice Cialone's first of two conversions made the score 7-7.

Citadel's Running Attack Swamps Davidson by 21-9

Missouri Beaten By Fordham, 20-12

By the Associated Press

New York, Nov. 21.—George Cheverko, who spent most of the day on the bench because of his indifferent play against Boston College last week, brought Fordham a touchdown in the final 38 seconds today to ice the contest with Missouri in a replay of the January 1 Sugar Bowl meeting. The final score was 20 to 12.

With Fordham ahead, 13 to 12, through the play of his freshman replacement, Al Litwa, Cheverko dropped back for a fourth down punt as most of the 11,000 spectators headed for the exits.

The low ball bounded from his fingers and by the time Cheverko had retrieved it and gotten his bearings he was hemmed in on his own 9. But he straightened out, shot through virtually the entire Missouri team on the 25 and tiptoed down the sidelines.

By the time he reached the Missouri 45 he was greeted by a reception committee from the Tiger secondary but lateralled to Tom Potter, substitute guard, who pounded the rest of the way home. Cheverko then added the extra point.

Until this incident, Fordham was holding a 1-point edge because of the disciplined halfback's conversion of Harry Squatrito's second-period touchdown.

Although he actually gave Fordham the lead, it was the play of Litwa that stood out. Litwa, weighing only 170 and hailing from Camden, N. J., averaged 49 yards each time he toed the ball, compared with 36 for the Missourians. He also completed two of Fordham's three perfect passes.

Huskers Take Worst Beating in History

By the Associated Press

Iowa City, Iowa, Nov. 21.—The Iowa Seahawks, a potent mixture of former collegiate and professional football stars, crushed Nebraska, 46 to 0, today, the worst defeat for the Cornhuskers since they started playing the gridiron sport back in 1890.

After the Navy racked up a first touchdown on nine plays following the opening kick-off there was little doubt concerning the ultimate result. Col. Bernie Bierman constantly shifted his personnel, at times by entirely new teams, but the score continued to mount as less than 4000 fans, mostly Navy cadets getting their first look at their favorites, marveled at Seahawk gridiron precision.

Top individual performance in the Seahawks' scoring parade came on the second play of the third period as Bob Swisher, former Northwestern ace, rambled 80 yards for the fourth Navy touchdown.

Dick Fisher accounted for the first touchdown and passed to Forest Evashevski for the second.

Jim Langhurst, who formerly played for Ohio State, and Babe Levoir, whose collegiate competition came under Colonel Bierman at Minnesota, each produced two touchdowns, Levoir's first being a twisting 19-yard run.

The statistics accurately mirror the engagement. The Seahawks collected 20 first downs to 4 for Nebraska and posted 424 net yards by rushing, compared with 38 for the foe.

went to the Ohio 20 on two pass plays. One from Halfback Paul White to sub halfback Bob Chappius—an Ohioan from Toledo—covered 30 yards and a Chappius pass to End Elmer Madar was good for 15.

Then Bob Wiese, Michigan's sophomore fullback, started his battering-ram attack. Except for one 5-yard advance by White, Wiese pounded to the 1, from where he went over. Jim Brieske, a substitute place-kicking artist, added the extra point.

Ohio was determined not to make the game close. Shaw intercepted one of White's passes on the Michigan 33 and the Bucks pounded to the 9, from where Fullback Gene Fekete tried a field goal that was low.

Wolverines Fumble

Michigan advanced to its 32, where White fumbled and Ohio recovered. Sarringhaus passed to Horvath on the next play and the fleetfooted halfback got the ball on the 5 and scampered across.

Michigan got back to the Ohio 24 with three minutes to play, but Sarringhaus intercepted a Kuzma pass to end the threat.

It was Michigan all the way as far as statistics went, but it was precision football—football that results in scores on perfectly executed plays—that gave Ohio its eighth win against one defeat for the season. The loss was Michigan's third in nine games.

Oklahoma Upset, 14-7, By Surprising Temple

By the Associated Press

Philadelphia, Nov. 21.— Little-regarded Temple, triumphant in only one previous game this year, smacked the highly favored University of Oklahoma Sooners, 14 to 7, in a startling reversal of football form today.

A scant crowd of 5000, huddled in a wind-swept Temple Stadium, saw the Owls capitalize on the brilliant running and passing of Freshman "Indian Joe" Nejman, the great punting of Jimmy Woodside and the standout defensive play of Right End Frank Kane to gain a well-deserved triumph.

"Indian Joe" threw a 44-yard pass to Kane that set up Temple's first touchdown in the second quarter. Kane was caught on the Sooner 8. Three plays were smeared for no gain, but on the fourth down Nejman whipped a pass to Bill Walitis on the goal line for the score.

Woodside Supplies Clincher

Woodside, who repeatedly kicked out of bounds within the Oklahoma 10-yard line, got Temple's second and what proved to be the winning touchdown by intercepting one of Huel Hamm's aerials in the last quarter and running 25 yards.

The Sooners, who previously had twice lost the ball on downs on the Temple 5 and one on the Temple 15, capitalized on an Owl fumble to score their touchdown with only two minutes to play. The touchdown came on a 31-yard pass, Hamm to Pat Shanks, substitute quarterback.

Kane, a freshman from Philadelphia, stopped the Sooners' second threat late in the opening quarter. On fourth down with 1 to go, on the Temple 5, he broke through and dumped Hamm at the line of scrimmage. George Sutch then fumbled, but Kane averted disaster by neatly tapping the ball out of bounds before an Oklahoma player could touch it.

Sooners Hold Edge in Air

The Sooners, who surprised last week by holding Missouri to a 6-6 tie, had an edge only in passing. They completed 11 of 22 aerials for 136 yards. Nejman completed 8 of 16 aerials for 98. All his completions came in the second quarter.

Temple outrushed their Big Six opponents, 159 yards to 92, and made 11 first downs to 9. Nejman gained 69 of the 159 yards. Total net yardage from both running and passing gave Temple 245 yards to 202.

90-Yard Touchdown Gallop Marks Penn State Victory

By the Associated Press

State College, Pa., Nov. 21.—That guy named Joe and another freshman, Bobby Williams, sparked Penn State to a 14-to-6 victory over Pittsburgh today to climax a surprisingly successful season for the Nittany Lions.

It was Larry Joe from New Derry, Pa., who brought the crowd of 12,000 to its feet at the start of the second half with a breath-taking, 90-yard return of the kick-off for the touchdown which broke a scoreless deadlock.

Then, after the Panthers had tallied to trail by only 7 to 6—Wilbur Van Lenten made good his placement kick for the extra point after Joe's run—Williams tossed a 6-yard forward to Big Aldo Cenci for the second clinching touchdown.

Pitt's Ace Stopped

The play of these yearling standouts, plus a stubborn line which throttled Pitt's ace, Bill Dutton, all afternoon gave State a season's record of six triumphs against one tie and a defeat.

Joe, one of the stars of the Lions' surprise triumph over Penn last week, took Walt West's kickoff to open the second half and sprinted straight up the middle of the sloppy gridiron to pay dirt. Excellent crisscross blocking by his mates set him free at midfield and he was clear the rest of the way.

Pitt came right back in the same period, set off when Frank Saksa of Braddock, Pa., returned a punt 40 yards to State's 10. After he gained a yard through the line, Dutton, the Weston, W. Va., star, passed to Walt West, Atlasburg, Pa., back, for the score. West's placement was blocked by Jack Branbury, Lion fullback.

Lions Drive 45 Yards to Score

Not content with the 7-to-6 advantage, the Lions traveled 48 yards in six plays for their second touchdown. Bob Weitzel, Shamokin, Pa., reserve fullback, rammed 22 yards to start the drive and Williams, of Pittsburgh, added 19. Williams then started a wide right end sweep and tossed to Cenci, 235-pound Scranton, Pa., blocking back, for the tally. Van Lenten again converted.

The Lions made seven first downs to three for the Panthers and a net yardage gain by rushing of 118 to 21. Pitt advanced 30 yards in the air to 10 for State but the winners intercepted five Panther forwards.

Stanford, With Year's Best Effort, Takes 26-7 Edge on Bears

45,000 See California Flattened

Brilliant Recovery Marks Indians' Last League Outing; Jurkovich Is Hurt

By the Associated Press

Berkeley, Calif., Nov. 21.—Stanford's Indians climaxed their Coast Conference football season in brilliant fashion today with a stunning 26 to 7 victory over University of California's hapless Bears.

The red-shirted boys who fumbled and stumbled their way to three defeats to start the 1942 gridiron schedule, finished like champions as they passed and raced to touchdowns in every period.

Some 45,000 fans, the smallest "big game" crowd in recent years, saw Stanford's famed T formation function as it did two years ago when the Indians charged to the league title and the Rose Bowl nomination.

The team, coached by Marchie Schwartz, left the field stamped practically the equal of the championship eleven of 1940 when Schwartz was only an assistant mentor and used chiefly in a scouting role.

Stanford scored its first touchdown on a 52-yard drive and transformed recovery of a free ball on California's 27 to a second period touchdown and a half time lead of 13-0.

A weak California punt paved the way for the third quarter touchdown. It went out of bounds on the Bears' 48 and Stanford crossed the former's last line three plays later. The scoring play was a 28-yard pass from Ray Hammett, quarterback, to Right End Roger Laverty, who ran 20 yards untouched.

Ross Dana, left halfback, intercepted a California pass and galloped 35 yards for the final Stanford touchdown. With the big lead established, Coach Schwartz ran in many substitutes, down to third stringers, and California scored its only touchdown against these boys.

The Indians added two of the extra tallies and the Bears made good on their only conversion chance.

State Routs Oregon, 39-2, For Record

By the Associated Press

Corvallis, Oreg., Nov. 21.—Oregon State Beavers, scoring five touchdowns by air, flashed the brilliance that carried them to a Rose Bowl victory last January by rolling over University of Oregon today, 39 to 2.

The Beavers ran up the most lopsided score recorded in the 47 times the two teams have met in one of the West's oldest and most bitter gridiron rivalries.

Combining their own aerial attack with an alert defense that intercepted more Oregon passes than were completed, Oregon State scored in every period.

Joe Day, State's sparkling fullback throughout the losing season, rose to heights again today. As acting captain, out of practice all week with an injury, he played most of the time the first team was in. He scored the first touchdown by diving 3 yards over a mass of players, then scored again in the third period. That time he took a short pass back in his own territory, jerked free from a group of tacklers, and ran down the side lines 55 yards to score.

Tommy Roblin and Bob Reynolds, chief backfield threats for Oregon, were effectively boxed by the Beaver line that consistently outcharged Oregon's.

An intercepted pass gave Oregon two points. Late in the fourth period Oregon recovered a fumble deep in State territory. Roy Erickson's pass was intercepted by Bob Libbee on the 5-yard line and he ran back of the goal trying to elude Russ Nowling who finally tackled him there for a safety.

Graham uncoiled his arm for the Wildcats' fourth-quarter score, hitting Clarence Hasse, Dud Kean and Bob Motl for a gain of 46 yards to set the props for Hirsch's second touchdown from the 3. Pick's kick clicked for the point.

Graham's brilliance in the air completely overshadowed the attempts of Notre Dame's passing pride, Bertelli. The willow-armed Wildcat completed 13 of 23 pitches for 175 yards; Angelo made 4 in 7 for 72. Graham even outgained the running yardage of leg-pumping Clatt, who clattered 149 yards on 23 trips.

Frederick II Wins Noel Laing Chase at Orange

By the Associated Press

Orange, Va., Nov. 21.—Frederick II, 5-year-old bay gelding owned by Isadore Beiber of Broklyn, with Emmet Roberts up, galloped to victory today in the Noel Laing Steeplechase Handicap, feature of the Montpelier Hunt Races at the estate of Mrs. Marion du Pont Scott.

In leading the field of nine, Frederick II did not equal the time of Corrigan last year, covering the course in 5:54 compared with Corrigan's 5:42.

A surprise winner, a 20-to-1 shot, was Field Fare, owned by W. S. Sprague, which captured the Montpelier Cup, leading the field of seven by four lengths. Second was Mrs. E. du Pont Weir's Picture Prince. Admiralty from the stable of Paul B. Codd of Montpelier was the favorite.

Sinkwich Breaks Schwenk's Total Offense Mark

By the Associated Press

Columbus, Ga., Nov. 21.—All-America Frankie Sinkwich's Georgia Bulldogs were humbled from the No. 1 spot in National football today by a great Auburn team, but the Youngstown, Ohio, lad plucked one bit of glory from the ruins.

Fireball Frankie broke the national record for total offense set last year by Bud Schwenk, of Washington Universiyt (St. Louis).

Sinkwich was credited with 177 of the yards Georgia gained by passing, and picked up 31 yards total of 2,023 yards. Schwenk's carrying the ball for a season's mark was 1928 yards.

0-0 Tie Posted In St. Albans, St. James Clash

Special Dispatch to The Post

Hagerstown, Md., Nov. 21.—Clashing on the St. James School gridiron, the St. Albans School eleven of Washington, D. C., fought to a scoreless tie with the St. James football eleven of Washington County this afternoon. Only once, in the fourth quarter, did it appear that a goal would be scored when the St. Albans aggregation had the ball on the St. James 2-yard line, were the fans brought to their feet. In the third quarter St. Albans launched a bitter passing attack which continued throughout the game but the St. James boys, hard on the defense, failed to be downed.

Throughout the entire first half of the game the playing was spiritless with neither team anywhere near their opponents' goal line.

Had St. Albans annexed a victory from St. James they would have sported an undefeated eight-game record with the interacademic conference championship crown awaiting them. St. James had a record of six victories and one loss this season.

Battering Rice Crushes T.C.U., 26 to 0

By the Associated Press

Houston, Tex., Nov. 21.—Rice's battering Owls, their line functioning like a machine and paced by a 190-pound end who also plays in the backfield, crushed Texas Christian, 26-0, today to remain in the Southwest Conference football race and virtually eliminate the Horned Frogs from championship consideration.

It was Windell Williams who led the boys in blue to one of the most one-sided defeats of a T. C. U. team in a decade as 14,000 looked on.

Williams caught passes, made tackles all over the field and when shifted to the backfield rolled up 45 yards running with the ball.

It was Dick Dwelle, smashing fullback, who cashed in on the Rice opportunities, scoring two touchdowns with line smashes and climaxing his big day with an 84-yard dash that brought another counter. Williams made one touchdown and Lindsay Bowen added two conversions.

Minnesota Beaten, 20 to 6, By Badgers in Big Ten Game

Gophers went to the Badger 40, but again Wisconsin held and partially blocked a punt to get out of danger.

Late in the quarter Herman Frickey, Gopher safety man, fumbled a punt on his 32 and Fred Negus, Wisconsin center recovered. Hirsch passed to Schreiner, who caught it on the 17 and raced for a touchdown. Harder converted.

A fumble by Hirsch on his own 41, recovered by Dick Wilding, Minnesota's captain, put the Badgers in the hole in the third period and play was mostly in their territory the rest of the quarter. The Gophers crashed to the Wisconsin 10 but lost the ball on downs, and moved to the 7 later on a series of smashes by Daley and Frickey, but Frickey's fumble stopped the drive.

Bob Baumann got off a great punt to push Minnesota to its 11 in the final period. The Gophers tried four plays, and a fourth down gamble gave Wisconsin the ball on the invaders' 19.

Harder passed to Schreiner on the four-yard line and then cracked center to the two. Anderson went over for a touchdown on a quarterback sneak, but Harder missed the try for an extra point and Wisconsin led, 20 to 0.

Late in the period Daley, Gopher halfback, broke loose for a 44-yard right-end run to Wisconsin's 15. Daley passed to Bill Garnaas on the one-yard line and then hit right tackle for a score. Garnaas' try for the extra point by a placement failed.

Tech turned back a fighting Florida team, 20-7, to remain unbeaten and untied, and apparently move up from second to first place in national gridiron rankings.

Glum Wally Butts, Georgia's coach, took the defeat philosophically. "I figured it had to happen sometime," he said, adding: "We missed quite a few passes. . . . Auburn deserved to win."

Happy Jack Meagher bubbled over: "We were glad to win, and I know Georgia was awfully disappointed."

A hard-charging line—harder-charging, by far, than anything Georgia had seen all season—was the difference between the two teams. It throttled Georgia's running attack, and rushed its passes until all-America Frankie Sinkwich and Charlie Trippi thought the roof was falling in.

But the charging of Auburn's line would have made little difference without the spectacular running of a great pair of backs—Reynolds at fullback and Gafford at tailback.

Sinkwich Sets Record

Operating often from a drunken-looking "T" formation, mixed with variations of a single-wing attack, they slashed Georgia's line like a high-speed harvester. Between them—with a little help on the side from Ty Irby and Zack Jenkins—they rolled up the astounding total of 355 yards by rushing while holding Sinkwich & Co. ("dream backfield" and all) to a net of 37 on the ground.

Georgia threw 34 passes and completed just 12—a gauge of the terrific pressure Auburn was putting on. Yardage by air was 190 for Georgia, of which 177 was credited to Sinkwich. With 31 yards additional by rushing, he pushed his total for the season to 2023 yards, breaking the previous national record for total offense established last year by Bud Schwenk of Washington University (St. Louis) with 1928 yards.

Sinkwich Scores

Sinkwich scored Georgia's first touchdown within four minutes of the kickoff, teaming with Trippi to go 58 yards in 10 plays, culminating with a scoring plunge for the final yard over center. Leo Costa, place-kicking expert, missed the try for extra point, but Georgia didn't mind.

Then Auburn began messing up the script. Reynolds lashed through the middle of the line, and Gafford sliced inside the tackles. In 13 plays and 4 successive first downs, they rolled 80 yards to a touchdown, Reynolds lunging over guard from the 2 to score. Louis Chateau, big Auburn tackle, made good his conversion and Auburn led, 7-6.

After an exchange of punts, Auburn opened up with a 71-yard drive which culminated in a scoring lateral from Aubrey Clayton to Monk Gafford for the last 3 yards and a touchdown. Chateau converted to put Auburn ahead 14-6.

Tigers Strike Again

Taking a Sinkwich punt on the Georgia 47 Gafford scooted back to the 18 before being stopped, and seven plays later Reynolds banged through tackle for a third touchdown. Chateau missed the conversion, and Auburn led, 206.

A punt by Zack Jenkins that went out of bounds on the Auburn 27 set up Georgia's only other touchdown. Sinkwich lost 9 yards on an attempted pass, then connected on the next pitch to Lamar Davis for the touchdown. This time Costa's kick was good. Auburn 20, Georgia 13. It might have ended that way, but Auburn came in swinging after the kickoff, driving 50 yards to Georgia's 16 before losing the ball on downs. Sinkwich, trying desperately for another touchdown failed to connect on one pass, was rushed and tackled for a 6-yard loss on the next try, and then was rushed again and felled behind his own goal. The ball spilled from his hands, and Fagan Canzoneri pounced on it to make the final score, 27-13.

Uclans Edge Huskies To Stay in Title Race

Bruins Snatch 14-10 Victory From Washington In Waning Seconds After Desperate Rally

By the Associated Press

Los Angeles, Nov. 21.—The U. C. L. A. Bruins snatched victory from an embattled crew of Washington Huskies in the last minute of play today, recovering a wildly bouncing bad pass from center and emerging with a 14-to-10 decision that kept them in the race for the Pacific Coast football title.

Thirty-five thousand fans saw the game.

Walt Harrison's wild snap-back eluded Bob Erickson from the 1-yard mark, rolled to the 10 and the ever-alert Bruin end, Milt Smith, swarmed on it to kill Washington's golden chance for victory.

U. C. L. A. looked like a championship football team only in the first few minutes of play. Al Solari took the opening kickoff on his 20 and then led a series of off-tackle smashes that carried 80 yards down the field and across the Washington goal. Solari scored the touchdown and Ken Snelling booted the point.

Bruins Lose Magic Touch

Bruin Coach Babe Horrell then sent in a string of substitutes and somewhere in the shuffle his team lost its magic touch. Washington began smothering everything U. C. L. A. had and as the game progressed took command of the attack. U. C. L. A. failed to make a single first down in the second half.

Washington started the second half just as the Bruins opened the game. From the U. C. L. A. 47, Erickson dashed through the U. C. L. A. right guard, cut back and scampered unmolested to a touchdown. Fred Olson's placement tied the score. The Huskies followed this up with a 65-yard march down to the Bruin 5, and here, as U. C. L. A. stiffened, Olson stepped back and booted a placement to give the Huskies a 10-7 advantage.

For a brief time this looked like the deciding margin, but U. C. L. A. quarterback Bob Waterfield turned the tide with a sharp pass to End Herb Wiener late in the third quarter. The pass was good for 23 yards and Wiener, who had sneaked behind Quarterback Fred Wehde and Erickson, ran 6 yards to the goal line.

Bad Pass Kills Hopes

A fumble by sub-Bruin back, Roy Kurrasch, late in the last quarter almost proved disastrous. Jack Tracy, Washington end, recovered on the U. C. L. A. 32, and from here Erickson passed to Sam Robinson for a first down on the 18, but U. C. L. A. really stiffened and a fourth-down pass from Erickson went past the end zone.

After Waterfield kicked out from behind his goal the Huskies began a spirited drive that carried right down to the 1-yard mark, first down, only to lose out on Harrison's bad pass.

The crowd let loose a mighty yell as the ball bounded around far behind the Washington backfield men. Smith, who had charged in fast, was all to himself as he smothered it. The Bruins then froze the ball and in three ground plays the final gun fired.

With defeat staring them in the face, the Harvards showed the power and finesse they never had uncovered before. They worked methodically to their own 35, then Wayne Johnson passed to fleet Cleo O'Donnell on Yale's 44 and he galloped on to the 25 for a total gain of 40 yards. Another pass from John Comeford to Lloyd Anderson brought a first down on the 7 and the old Blues quavered.

Everyone in the great bowl was tense, but it turned out that the Crimson players were tied up tighter than all the rest. They tried a play over center and Capt. Spence Moseley spilled Johnson for no gain. A perfect bullet pass by Johnson was dropped on the goal line. Then Johnson culdn't find a receiver and barely got back to the line of scrimmage with no loss. Finally Comeford tried a pass to Johnson in the flat at left end, and the toss was right to the mark, but was dropped again and the game might as well have stopped immediately. It did one play later.

Elis Stop Crimson Drive

Harvard's only other drive came late in the second period and carried from the Crimson 39 to Yale's 10, with Johnson, Comeford and O'Donnell skirting the ends and slicing through the line for repeated gains. But the Elis became stubborn in the shadow of their own goal.

Finally on fourth down Bob Fisher, one of three brothers on the team and a son of a former Harvard coach, came into the line-up for the first time this year and placekicked a field goal from the 18.

Creighton Drops Before Tulsa, 33-19

By the Associated Press

Omaha, Nov. 21.—Tulsa's Golden Hurricane overcame an early deficit to continue on its undefeated path, downing Creighton 33 to 19 today before a crowd of 9000. The Titsans, possessing a superb aerial attack, clinched the Missouri Valley Conference championship on their victory.

The Bowl-bound Oklahoma team was given its most severe test of the season by the Bluejays, who unleashed a brilliant ground and aerial attack, before being overpowered in the final period. For three quarters the teams fought it out on even terms, going into the last period with the score 19-19.

Tulsa was led to victory by the versatile Glenn Dobbs and Keithley, with Judd starring at end, as he snagged three touchdown passes. The Bluejays had several stars, Johnny Tedore, whose 63-yard run led to the first Creighton touchdown, and Al DiMarco, who hurled a 54-yard touchdown pass to Bill Brock in the second period and a 5-yard toss to the same Brock in the third.

A.I.B. to Start Course for New Bank Employes

To meet the needs of short-handed Washington banks, the local chapter of the American Institute of Banking will start an educational course for new bank employes.

George B. Earnshaw, chairman of the chapter's educational committee, yesterday announced that the first of a series of nine weekly lectures on "An Introduction to the Study of Banking" will be offered Monday at 8 p. m.

The courses will be conducted by Ralph Endicott, assistant treasurer of the Washington Loan & Trust Co. Mr. Endicott is a graduate of the Graduate School of Banking, Rutgers University, and has conducted classes for the Washington chapter for a number of years.

That the introductory course will be welcomed here is assured. Local banks, as well as those throughout the Nation, have had a rapid turnover in personnel since Pearl Harbor. The average turnover in the past 10 months, it was reported last week, has been about 20 per cent.

Record Christmas Sales Continue in Week; Shoppers Move Up From Bargain Basements

New York, Nov. 21.—Americans now are on a Christmas shopping spree in this last great Nation which still can call itself a land of plenty.

Department stores and retail trade this week continued a record holiday business which started in October.

Stores in war production areas are doing best. Their increase for the last three months of 1942 may be 25 to 50 per cent above the same period a year ago.

Here are some explanations for the buying splurge:

The rush began in October to get gifts for the men in the armed services. Packages for them had to be shipped long before the holidays.

Shoppers know that never again while the war lasts will the stores have the present tremendous supplies which must dwindle as the Nation's production turns steadily to ever greater war output.

Many persons working in war plants for the first time in their lives have real spending money. They are moving up from the bargain basements to the main floor's quality merchandise.

Much money, which is not going into war bonds and might have gone into purchasing automobiles if this were peacetime, is being spent in stores.

There have been campaigns everywhere urging shoppers to buy early and carry their purchases whenever possible.

Shoppers know that deliveries, because of the need to cut down unnecessary wartime transportation, can not be as plentiful as last year.

Although these same shoppers know that the sharp new taxes will hit them next March, that is three months beyond the holiday hill and right now they are thinking of Christmas.

Good war news also may have been a factor in loosening their pocketbook zippers.

The Census Bureau points out in October, jewelry store sales were 32 per cent over a year ago, apparel and department stores, 32 per cent and drug stores, 31 per cent.

Total retail increases from 34 States making reports, according to the bureau, were 12 per cent.

The average was held down by the drop in such unobtainable items—for the average citizen—as automobiles and in a rationed items like gasoline.

The decline in automobile purchases was 81 per cent and the filling station business dropped off 11 per cent.

Some observers believe Nationwide department store volume for November and December combined will show a 20 per cent average increase. If it were only a 10 per cent rise, it still would be good.

The percentage increase for department store sales this year showed for every month—except May and August—an increase over the corresponding month of 1941.

Dun & Bradstreet, Inc., estimated current national retail sales this week at 14 to 17 per cent above the same week a year ago in dollar volume.

Some of that increase might be due to higher prices, but the buying was at record levels.

The Wall Street Journal reported that, in spite of higher taxes, for the fiscal year ending next January 31, department stores' income probably would be as good, if not better, than last year.

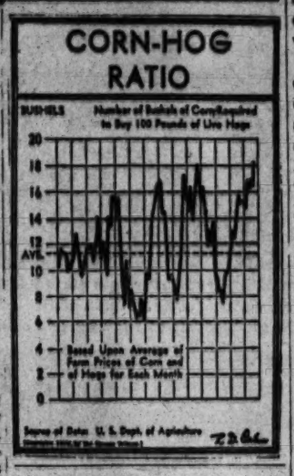
Will the buying scramble last right up to December 24? Will the present rush cause a slump in late December purchases?

Some observers think it possible, although there is no present indication that it will. But they say that if there is a tapering off, Christmas buying still will have set a record.

They believe that the present buying demand—by extending over October, November and into December—will more than make up for any late decline.

Stores in war production centers reportedly are selling goods as fast as they can be obtained, which is often less than a problem than finding salesmen and saleswomen.

In those same production centers a salesgirl making $24 a week behind a counter would not be reluctant to move over to a war plant that paid her more.



Vacuum Cleaner Sales to Public Again Allowed

By the Associated Press

Sale of new vacuum cleaners to the public became legal again yesterday.

The War Production Board authorized all retailers and wholesalers to sell to the public any vacuum cleaners they have on hand. Such sales had been forbidden since October 24.

Officials said they did not know how many cleaners this would make available, but that the number was substantial.

Vacuum cleaners held by manufacturers, their affiliates and "private brand sellers" who have 500 or more cleaners remain frozen pending determination of how many of these machines are needed by the armed forces.

Studies have gone far enough to show that the military do not need the machines held by retailers and wholesalers, it was explained. Officials said that some of the manufacturers' stock may also be opened for public sale later on.

Select Shares Move Upward In Steady List

By Bernard S. O'Hara

New York, Nov. 21.—Peacetime stocks, including gold mines, kept the recovery theme alive in today's stock market but many leaders ended a generally declining week without getting anywhere.

Further bullish war news, in addition to pleasing dividends and earnings reports, served to buoy selected shares and offset to a considerable extent profit cashing on Friday's rally. Tax selling again was fairly well absorbed but there was enough to restrain buyers.

The Associated Press average of 60 stocks was unchanged at 40.1 but on the week showed a net loss of .4. Large blocks of low-priced issues helped put volume at 310,700 shares compared with 260,620 in the previous two-hour session.

International Telephone was the liveliest performer, as in yesterday's proceedings. It opened on a 4,000-share trade, up a fraction at a new year's high, then met enough offering to put it down ¼ at 6⅝ when the final gong sounded. Alaska-Juneau and Dome Mines were just behind the communications stock in activity and both touched peak levels for 1942. Homestake also was one of the fastest movers of the day with a gain of 1⅝.

Bonds were a shade uneven. At Chicago wheat was up ⅜ to ⅝ of a cent a bushel, corn ahead ½ to ¾ and hogs steady. Cotton was 5 cents a bale higher to 75 cents lower.

In the Curb improvement was shown by American Cynamid "B," Crocker Wheeler, Aluminum of America and Niles-Bement-Pond. On the off side were American Gas, Electric Bond & Share and United Light. The aggregate here was 83,115 shares versus 56,360 last Saturday.

DuPont to Scrap Historic Wheels

Wilmington, Del., Nov. 21 (AP).—Huge iron wheels that ground out gun powder for the Union Army in the Civil War and for American forces in two other conflicts are being added to the Nation's scrap metal heap by E. I. duPont de Nemours & Co., it was announced today.

The wheels, numbering 28 and weighing 210 tons, are part of the equipment in duPont's Eleutherian Mills, founded 140 years ago on historic Brandywine Creek.

A single set of the wheels will be preserved in original mounting, the company said, as a memorial to one of the Nation's first ventures in gunpowder making.

The Eleutherian Mills ceased operation as a powder works in 1923 because of the advancement of smokeless powder, first used on a large scale in the World War.

Speed Check Developed

Akron, Nov. 2.—Described as "a help for motorists in overcoming the ingrained habit of fast driving" in complying with the 35-mile-per-hour conservation level, a new "speed warden" device for the acceleration pedal has been developed by the B. F. Goodrich Co.

Sharp Decline In Hog Prices Cheers Packers

By the Associated Press

Chicago, Nov. 21.—Hog prices finally have declined to a point where packers probably again are operating at a profit in their pork business, livestock circles said today. It is a rather unique situation for most packers, who claim to have lost money on their meat operations for many months.

Prices have slumped steadily for about four weeks, canceling much of the gain scored throughout the greater part of this year. The practical top at the week's close was $13.70 a hundred pounds, lowest since late March. This contrasted with a high of $15.70 in October.

The downturn, trade sources said, was based on the fact that heavy shipments are expected within a few weeks and packers believe they can get all the slaughter material they need at that time. There are now indications that the supply is beginning to expand.

All sources are eagerly awaiting the anticipated increase in marketings. Domestic consumers have found difficulty in getting certain types of pork meat at retail stores, the Army is anxious to obtain meat without placing too great a strain on civilian supplies and the Agricultural Marketing Administration, Government lend-lease buying agency, is ready to expand its purchases along with the heavier runs.

The price at which hogs must sell in order to provide a "cut-out" profit to packers operating under pork ceilings depends to some extent upon the efficiency of individual packing plants. However, observers are agreed that present prices should allow most packers some profit, although it is admitted that there may be a few who still are operating at a loss.

Late Earnings Statements

United Drug, Inc., reported a net profit of $1,585,628, after provision for Federal taxes, depreciation and bond interest, for the nine months ended September 30. This profit amounted to $1.13 per share on the 1,400,560 common shares outstanding, the company stated, and compared with a net profit of $1,293,912 for the first nine months of 1941, which was equivalent to 92 cents per share.

L. C. Smith & Corona Typewriters, Inc., reported for the quarter ended September 30 consolidated net profit of $2451, equal to 19 cents a share on the $6 cumulative preferred stock. This compared with net profit of $418,573, or $1.44 a share on the common stock, in the September quarter last year. The company's fiscal year ends June 30.

Pan American Petroleum & Transport Co. and subsidiaries reported net profit of $2,536,816, or 54 cents a share, for the nine months ended September 30, compared with $5,702,896, or $1.21 a share, in the like 1941 period.

Union Bag & Paper Co. reported for the September quarter net income of $457,872, equal to 36 cents a share on the capital stock, compared with $607,470, or 48 cents a share, in the like quarter of 1941.

Sacrifice to Buy War Bonds Declared Vital; Sound Financing Now Needed for Victory

New York, Nov. 21.—If you want, after this war, the free and abundant life we are fighting for, slash your living to essentials and buy war bonds.

That is the way economists and financial experts are increasingly explaining the vital and urgent responsibility of Americans to invest all they can possibly save in the securities of Uncle Sam.

The fact is that even with the high taxes, there is more spending money than ever before and a decreasing supply of the things for which money can readily be spent.

The big job of the United States Treasury and the many voluntary groups promoting the sales of its bonds is to make Americans understand the urgency of getting this money invested in Treasury securities—the best investment available in the world today.

Thus far, the Treasury has had to borrow heavily from the banks. Sales of its bonds to the public have been nowhere near enough. But the extent to which the cost of the war is piled onto the banks will be a major factor in determining the ability of the Nation to avoid the chaos of inflation after the war, and in removing wartime controls to permit a return to the free way of life.

Financing the war effort through borrowing from the banks is something which will have to be done in huge volume, but economists agree that it must be done with our eyes open. Says Dr. Gustave Stolper, Austrian-born economist who saw the horrors of inflation after the last war, "The likelihood of inflation is greatly minimized, if we are aware of its potential approach, if everyone is talking about it."

Why is borrowing from the banks inflationary? Dr. Edwin Walter Kemmerer of Princeton, in his recent book, "The ABC of Inflation," explains it this way:

"It converts Government debt into new bank deposits that circulate by check. The Government's deposits are increased, but the deposits of individuals are not correspondingly decreased, as they would be if the public were buying the bonds and paying for them in full out of current income and accumulated savings."

Bank checks are the circulating medium, the money, of this country. We do 90 per cent of our everyday business with checks. When a bank buys a bond from the Treasury it pays for it by giving the Treasury a deposit on its books. When the Treasury spends this money it merely writes a check and transfers the deposit to someone else. When you or I buy a Government bond we draw on our bank account to pay for it, so no additional bank deposit is created. Harry Scherman, economics writer, has described this Government financing through banks as creation of "invisible greenbacks."

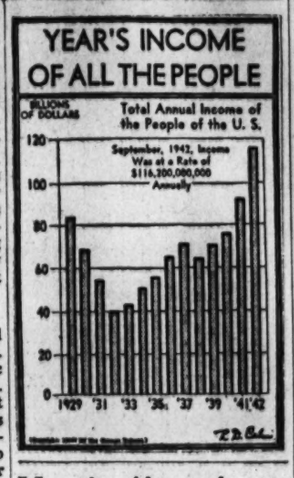
Says Alfred G. Buehler, professor of public finance at the University of Pennsylvania, in "Foreign Policy Reports:"

"We must . . . be on the alert to detect and resist the encroachments of that insidious enemy of every nation—the financial disease of inflation—which may rot away the economic, political and social foundations of our way of life. This enemy, too, we must conquer if the United Nations are to win the opportunity to reconstruct the world after the war."

Banking authorities point out that banks are capable of almost fantastic credit expansion to finance the war without danger to themselves. The danger is in what these huge bank deposits might do to the country when depositors spend them. Spending the deposits only transfers them to others. The rate with which the deposits are being transferred—velocity, as it is called—is what makes the money supply inflationary.

Meanwhile, the war savings staff, with its 300,000 volunteer workers, will be making a drive to add at least 7,000,000 more income earners to buyers of the regular war bonds through payroll savings plans.

At the same time two other issues, intended for banks as well as other buyers, will be a series of 1¾ per cent bonds due June 15, 1948, and a series of one-year certificates.



Martin Aircraft Votes Dividend Of $1.50 a Share

Baltimore, Nov. 21 (AP).—A dividend of $1.50 per share on common stock was declared by the Glenn L. Martin Co. at a meeting of its board of directors Friday, it was announced today by Glenn L. Martin, president of the company.

The only 1942 dividend is payable on December 11, 1942, to stockholders of record December 11, 1941. The Martin Co. declared two dividends in 1941, each of $1.50 per share and two of $1 in 1940.

The company has not issued a financial statement during 1942 because of Government restrictions, but Martin reviewed the year with satisfaction.

"We are meeting our schedule," he said. "All of the facilities built during 1941 and 1942 are now in operation. Our obligation in the war effort has increased far beyond our expectations, but we expect to keep the redoubled pace set for us during 1943."

New York Cotton

New York, Nov. 21 (AP).—The October position in cotton futures closed 75 cents a bale lower while the range for other contracts was 5 cents higher to 25 cents off after erratic trading movements.

Near months held firm under aggressive trade price-fixing demand while hedge-selling and liquidation caused declines in distant positions. October, selling off as much as $1 a bale part of the session, was at a discount to all other trading contracts on the board.

Federal Curbs And War Slash Grain Trading

By the Associated Press

Chicago, Nov. 21.—The war and Government price stabilization operations have reduced trading in grain futures on the Chicago Board of Trade to 72 per cent of last year's volume and the smallest on record. Trading still involves almost five billion bushels annually, however.

While volume of trading is not the smallest in the grain exchange's history, spanning almost a century, the market has experienced no slump in business as drastic since the Federal Government started keeping records in 1921.

Up until mid-November transactions in all grains on the exchange totaled only 4,088,069,000 bushels, compared with 5,657,075,000 the corresponding period last year.

Traders estimated that, at the current rate of business, volume for the entire year will be around 4,400,000,000 bushels, against 6,280,353,000 last year.

The sharpest drop in trading this year has occurred in the wheat pit, where volume of transactions so far is less than 1,700,000,000 bushels, or about half that of a year ago. This cut was only partially offset by a substantial expansion in corn and rye trading. Corn volume so far is slightly better than a billion bushels compared with 600 million a year ago; rye volume near 800 million compared with 270 million a year ago. Trade in soybeans has dropped to about 192 million bushels compared with 884 million a year ago, when volume was the best on record.

Uncertainty regarding price control and the Government's plans to regulate grain prices without resort to outright ceilings or price-fixing, which dealers said probably would kill the futures trade, had been responsible for the slow business.

Breath-Taking Round of Fetes Planned for President Roosevelt's Next Official Guest—President Arroyo del Rio of Ecuador

Scheduled to arrive in Washington tomorrow afternoon, the President of Ecuador, Carlos Arroyo del Rio, accompanied by a distinguished group of statesmen, will soon be launched on an all-out round of official fetes, beginning with a dinner at the White House tomorrow evening.

In compliment to both President Arroyo and his popular envoy here, Capt. Colon Eloy Alfaro, officialdom of this wartime Capital will negotiate a calendar crowded with dinners, luncheons and receptions right through Thanksgiving week. The 21-gun salute that will welcome the visiting President when he arrives in Washington will be the opening volley of a social "charge" such as this town has seen but few times since war clouds gathered.

Here is the official schedule:

Monday—The Presidential party will be met upon arrival by President Roosevelt and representatives of the State Department. The visitor will then be escorted to the White House, where he will be a guest overnight and will be feted at a state dinner.

Tuesday—President Arroyo will join members of his official party at Blair House, his official residence for the remainder of his visit. At noon he will be at the Capitol, where he will be received by a group of Senators and Representatives. At 1 o'clock he will be guest of honor at a luncheon to be given by members of the governing board of the Pan American Union. He will hold a press conference at 3 o'clock the same day; will receive an honorary degree at George Washington University at 4 o'clock, and will be honored by a dinner at which Secretary of State Cordell Hull will be host at the Carlton Hotel that evening.

Wednesday—A trip to Mount Vernon and Arlington, beginning at 10 o'clock, will start the third day's program for President Arroyo. Nelson Rockefeller will honor the visitor at luncheon that day, and from 5 to 7 p. m. several hundred guests will meet His Excellency at the reception to be given in his honor by Ambassador Alfaro at the Pan American Union. A dinner at which Undersecretary of State Sumner Welles will be host that evening will conclude the official program for that day.

Thursday—President Arroyo's visit to Annapolis that morning will be finished off with a luncheon at 1:30 when the superintendent of the Naval Academy, Admiral John R. Beardall, will be host. That evening Ambassador Alfaro will fete his President at a formal dinner at the Mayflower Hotel.

Friday—Assistant Secretary of State Adolf A. Berle will entertain at a luncheon in honor of the visitor, and that afternoon at 5:10 the latter will be off to Detroit for a tour of war production plants the following day.

Sunday—President Arroyo will leave for Buffalo to continue his tour of war production plants and from there will go to New York,

Bandsmen Enter Army; Hep Cats Stranded

By Peggy Preston.

They're in the Army now and it's just too bad for the hep cats and jitterbugs.

About the only thing the latter can do is join up with Uncle Sam themselves in order to take another gander at the boys who use to roll out that hot rhythm.

The music business has been one of the hardest hit of the professions, according to such authorities as Variety, etc. They've "Gone Out of This World," all right, and dozens of members of big-name bands in the country are blowing their horns to a different tune in the Nation's service centers.

Among the top-notchers already in uniform are Artie Shaw, who is now with the Navy, and Glenn Miller, now a captain in the Army. Sammy Kaye is awaiting his call and has arranged for Tommy Ryan, his vocalist, to carry on with the band in his stead.

Johnny Long, whose orchestra was selected to play for the President's Birthday Ball last January at Uline's Arena, is exempt from service due to a lame hand, but his band is practically a shadow of its former self. Gone from its ranks are such men as Bob Houston, popular vocalist, now stationed at Camp Pickett, Va., and Ogden Davies, husband of Helen Young, a chanteuse with the band. All in all, Long has lost seven men from his group, and in the band business that is almost disastrous.

Don Cornell At Camp Stewart

To mention but a few of the other better-known musicians from "name bands," now in the service: Don Cornell, guitarist-singer with Sammy Kaye, now at Camp Stewart, West Point, N. Y.; George Brandon, saxophone player, and Lloyd Gilliam, trumpeter, in the Marines, and Ralph Flennikin, saxophonist, in the Navy. All are from Kaye's band.

The particular lament of orchestra leaders is that when men move out in groups of fours and fives, the general tenor of the group is altered. Musicians who play together get to know each man's style and his idiosyncrasies. In time their styles blend together for a harmonious effect that makes this or that band more popular than another. This "feel" that musicians achieve is the style that listeners rave about in their favorite bands.

And so the profession is resorting to the methods of other industries. Women are taking over again.

Girl Trumpeter In Band

Already Woody Herman has a girl trumpeter, Billie Rogers; and Henry King has Mary Wood on the violin. There are a few skeptics left, but the majority of musicians feel that given time, women can prove themselves as good as men in the realm of popular bands.

Even the staid National Symphony, once an all-man organization, has relaxed its rules to include five women with a sixth scheduled for rehearsals any day. They include Marguerite Kuehne, violinist; Kay Rickert, also a violinist; Louise Ehrman, cellist; Natalie Hollern, oboe and English horn player, and Sylvia Meyer, harpist. Miss Meyer, however, has been with the orchestra since its first season.

So there seems to be a solution to every problem. Cherchez la femme!

Miss Joan Wilkinson Wed to Lieut. George T. Hall

Marked with wartime simplicity was the wedding yesterday of Miss Joan Susannah Wilkinson, daughter of Rear Admiral Theodore Stark Wilkinson, and Lieut. (j. g.) George Tait Hall, U. S. N. R., which took place at 4 o'clock in St. John's Church and was followed by a small reception at the home of the bride's parents in Arlington, Va. The bridegroom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Carter Hall of Wilton, Conn.

As Admiral Wilkinson is now on duty in the Pacific, the bride was given in marriage by her cousin, Edward Whitman. She wore her grandmother's wedding gown of mellow ivory satin made with a square neck and elbow length puffed sleeves. The full skirt fell into a short train and a longer train of tulle was combined with her veil, which was held by a coronet of lace. She carried a bouquet of white orchids.

Miss Ann Harlow Wilkinson was her sister's maid of honor and the bridesmaids were Mrs. Peter Truesdale of Charlottesville, Va.; Miss Margaret Lukens of Philadelphia, Miss Marianna Evans of Washington, Miss Jane Hibbard of Grand Rapids, Mich., and Mrs. Albert Andrews of Bronxville, N. Y.

The maid of honor's gown was of violet taffeta made on simple lines with elbow sleeves, a full skirt with a ruffle at the hips. The other attendants wore gowns of the same model in hyacinth blue. All carried bouquets of rose colored chrysanthemums and wore coronets of the same flowers in their hair.

The ushers were Ensign William Stucky, U. S. N.; Lieut. Frank Rounds, U. S. N.; Hollis Seavey, U. S. N.; Lieut. Albert Andrews, U. S. N.; Lieut. Shaw Walker, U. S. N., and Capt. McKnight Kinne, U. S. A.

After a short honeymoon Lieutenant Hall and his bride will return to Washington and will be at home at 4103 W Street.

The bride attended the Madeira School and was graduated from Vassar College in June. She was presented to society in Washington in 1939.

Lieutenant Hall studied at Andover and was graduated from Yale University in 1937.

Lieut., Mrs. Gartrell At Home in Florida

Now making their home in Miami, Fla., are Lieut. and Mrs. Luther S. Gartrell, whose marriage took place recently at Miami Beach, where the bridegroom is stationed.

The bride is the former Miss Alyce Marguerite Powell, daughter of Mrs. Myrtle Powell Smith of Washington. She was graduated from the Greenville Woman's College at Greenville, S. C. Lieutenant Gartrell, who is a flight surgeon with the Army Air Corps, was graduated from the University of Arkansas. He was on the physicians staff of the Packard Company in Detroit before receiving his commission in the Army.

Dean of Diplomats—

Peru's Ambassador, Oldest in Point of Service Here, Is Also One of the Wittiest, Wisest and Most Popular Members of the Diplomatic Corps; Has Longest Name

By Carolyn Bell

HE IS THE first to do real justice to the job of Dean of the Diplomatic Corps since Jusserand—sighs the old-timer. Do you mean that dapper gentleman with the clipped British accent is a South American Ambassador?—queries the newcomer. And a New Dealer, who has only been here for the past nine years, might suddenly discover he is quite the wittiest diplomat in town.

Carolyn Bell

The above being a rather involved introduction to the Dean of the Diplomats and the gentleman with the longest name in the Blue Book: the Peruvian Ambassador, Senor Don Manuel de Freyre Santander.

To one who knows him only casually, the Ambassador from Lima might seem a bit austere—but the twinkle in those gray eyes gives him away. At most official functions he is punctual, makes the usual rounds and more often than not departs quickly. But at intime gatherings it's another story. Extra men may be easier to corral in Washington these days but any hostess who can seat Freyre at her right at a dinner party is still considered a clever entertainer—war personalities notwithstanding.

While many a country has swanked up its embassy, or bought a new one in the more fashionable part of town, the Ambassador still calls the bleak, red-brick mansion on Scott Circle "home." Even a streamlined underpass couldn't move him out. And while many of our Latin friends specialize in colossal fiestas—to impress Washington—Freyre goes quietly about this business of diplomacy, with never a party-thought in his head.

A widower, he is a devoted father and spends much of his time with his two youngsters, Frank and Peggy, who have become a part of the Washington scene. Peggy, no doubt, takes after her mother who was famed for her Irish beauty. Long before the Ambassador became Dean of the Diplomatic Corps he was considered "quite a catch." And more than one Washington matron has set her cap for the gentleman—but to no avail, apparently.

Freyre (It's permissible to drop the Santander as in most Latin names), has the jump on many of his colleagues, for he not only was stationed in Washington once before—but was born here! He first saw the light of day in 1872 in the Peruvian Legation, then located in the vicinity of St. Matthew's Church. His father was at that time Peruvian Minister to this country and so it was quite natural that son, Manuel (after dabbling about), should follow in his footsteps. His background being cosmopolitan, to say the least, he has an easy grasp of international subjects. His father was of German descent while his mother hailed from Holland. Shortly after his father's death, the diplomat-to-be set off for Europe with his mother and there completed his education in England, Italy and Switzerland. He studied civil engineering as a youth—and while he may be able to build a bridge, his field is quite definitely diplomacy.

SENOR DON MANUEL DE FREYRE Y SANTANDER

Since entering the diplomatic service of his country away back in 1902 he has been en poste in many parts of the globe. He first went to Switzerland—as a lowly attache—later to Colombia and then arrived in Washington with the rank of First Secretary. It was some time later—10 years to be exact—that he was given the rank of Minister in Washington. And there was another intervening period, during which he served in the Orient, South America and Great Britain, before he returned here as Ambassador. That was in July 24, 1930, and needless to add, he has been here ever since.

Slim of build, the Ambassador is peppy and brisk in his walk. Two of his greatest joys include a saunter down the treelined avenues of the Capital and his mid-afternoon snooze. An astute chess player, he finds son Frank is becoming harder and harder to beat.

One of the cutest stories told about Ambassador de Freyre has to do with his favorite dog. After his daily walk the envoy returned to the embassy minus the puppy at his heels. Asked where the pet was he replied "Alas, alas I fear she has entered the Convent!" Seems that the dog scampered into the grounds of Sacred Heart Convent (where Peggy attended school) and as the public is forbidden from the grounds, the Ambassador could not go after her. But evidently the canine soon tired of the restricted life for she returned to the embassy.

General's Daughter Is Engaged

Falmouth, Mass., Nov. 21.—Brig. Gen. and Mrs. Daniel Noce of the city announce the engagement of their daughter, Mildred Wilson Noce, to Capt. Philip B. Melody, son of Mr. and Mrs. William H. Melody of Lexington, Mass.

She is a member of the Alpha Omicron Pi Sorority. Her father is commander of the Army's newest organizations, the Engineer Amphibian Command. This command is a branch of the United States Army Engineers, specializing in landing operations. Miss Noce is a niece of Maj. Robert L. Cavanaugh, M. C., U. S. A., and Mrs. Cavanaugh, who are now stationed in Panama.

Captain Melody is a graduate of the University of Illinois and has done graduate work at Boston University. He was in the Cavalry Reserve and has been on active duty for two years. His present station is at Camp Edwards where he is attached to headquarters of the Engineer Amphibian Command.

The military wedding ceremony will be performed by Chaplain Lieut. Col. Joseph P. McNamara, on Saturday, November 28, in the command chapel of the Engineer Amphibian Command.

Dorothy Mae Stoutenburgh Is Wed to G. A. Didder, Jr.

St. Matthew's Cathedral was the scene of the wedding yesterday of Miss Dorothy Mae Stoutenburgh, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James A. Stoutenburgh, and George A. Didden, jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. Didden of Washington. The Rev. John S. Spence officiated at the ceremony.

The bride, who was given in marriage by her father, wore a gown of ivory satin made with a sweetheart neckline and full skirt falling into a train. Her veil of illusion was held in place by a coronet of seed pearls and she carried a bouquet of brides roses, stephanotis and orchids.

The matron of honor and only attendant, Mrs. O'Ferrell Estes, wore a dress of powder blue made with a fitted bodice of silk jersey and a full skirt of chiffon. Her headdress was of matching ostrich tips and veiling and she carried a bouquet of gold chrysanthemums.

Albert Didden served his brother as best man and the ushers were Frank B. Stoutenburgh, a brother of the bride, John Kester Knighton of Evansville, Ind., Harry G. Isemann and Philip C. Greenwell.

Following the ceremony a reception was held in the Burgundy Room of the Wardman Park Hotel. The couple will make their home in Washington.

FLASH—War to Be Shortlived Now That Luis Rose Ugarta and His Career Record Are in Washington

By Patricia Grady

HERE'S THE SILVER LINING in that war cloud that you've been looking for. It is NOT going to be a long war. It can't be. Luis Rose Ugarta is in Washington on a "duration" job and he never stays longer than two years in one place.

PATRICIA GRADY

A Jack of all trades and master of many, Senor Ugarta has tried his hand at an assortment of careers, from mining to taking the first census of Peru. He is here now as an advisor to Enrique de Lozado, who in turn is an advisor on affairs Latin-American to Nelson Rockefeller. Economics is his speciality, but Senor Ugarta can also dispense advice on an assortment of subjects including public health, sanitation, labor and politics.

"I am a very good secretary," he points out as he mentions the names of numbers of outstanding Peruvians, including President Prado, whose private secretary he has been. In fact, he was such a good secretary that for a time it appeared he would be kept at it for his own "duration."

THEN CAME the Peruvian census. "It was a very necessary thing," explains the blue-eyed Latin, "for how could we, as a government, plan anything when we didn't even know how many people there were in the country. I asked for a chance to help out and was appointed chief officer of the census, working with an imported census expert."

It was quite a ticklish job to convince the people, who had never before heard of a census, that the information gathered would not be used for political, taxation, or military purposes. "We told the people we would burn all the information the minute the count was completed," continues its chief counter, "and they cooperated with us splendidly. It took over two years to do the job."

But before the two years was up, Senor Ugarta was moving on to different fields. In cooperation with the Peruvian agrarian group, he helped set up a Peruvian cotton exchange, bringing top men in from the Liverpool exchange to help with the job. Senor Ugarta stayed on just long enough to see that the exchange was operating effectively, then on to Washington and his present post.

SPEAKING ENGLISH with the idiomatic ease of a Dead End Kid, Senor Ugarta owes this language heritage to his American father. Because of the several years he spent in Bolivia with an American company, Senora Ugarta is an advisor on both Bolivia and his native Peru.

"It is necessary for me to keep up to date," says this energetic advisor, "so I write to my friends in these countries asking them for much information. They think I must be terribly important since I am in Washington—Washington is a magic name in Latin America—and that I am probably a confidential advisor to the President, so they write me lots of details about lots of things."

ABOUT A YEAR AGO, Senor Ugarta had plans made for a trip to Japan—he just thought it would be educational to see the country and study its economy—but other interests arose and he had to postpone his trip a few months. He is still promising himself that trip, but not for a few years.

Senora de Rose Ugarta and their children are in Lima and are not planning to join Senor Ugarta here. But, on the basis of his record, the family will be together again before too long. The war gods are doomed.

Something New in Jewels

Patriotic note for lapel pins is the platinum V, which dangles from the smart gray pin-stripe suit which Mrs. Jock McLean is wearing often these days while visiting in New York.

There's an airplane set upon the V heavily encrusted with diamonds and sapphires to add to the patriotic touch. Perhaps the former Agnes Pyne Bacon's penchant for airplanes comes from the planes which she and her husband turn out down in Texas, where they also run a rancho.

Lunching at the Colony Club a few days ago, Mr. and Mrs. McLean ran into Lieut. and Mrs. Douglas Fairbanks, who were with the William Rhinelander Stewarts. On leave from the Navy, Douglas Fairbanks was making his first appearance since taking part in the Commando raid on Dieppe and expects to be called back to duty immediately.

THE FORMER Miss Peggy Belt of Baltimore and The Plains and Charles Thelin Turner, announce the birth of a daughter in Baltimore.

Parents of a new daughter are Ensign and Mrs. Joe H. Tonahill. The baby was born in Alexandria, where Mrs. Tonahill is staying with her father, Judge Howard W. Smith, while her husband is overseas. She was formerly Miss Violet Smith of Fauquier County.

In Washington, Mr. and Mrs. John W. Bailey jr., are being congratulated on the arrival of a son, John Keith Bailey at Doctor's Hospital. Mrs. Bailey is the former Miss Margaret Randolph Keith of Fairfax, Va., and her husband is with the State Department.

MRS. BEVERLEY CORYELL of The Plains, announces the engagement of her daughter, Miss Virginia Beverley Coryell to Lieut. Colin Stuart Campbell, Royal Canadian Navy of Halifax, Nova Scotia, son of Mr. and Mrs. George D. Campbell of Weymouth, Nova Scotia.

Dean of Diplomats—

Peru's Ambassador, Oldest in Point of Service Here, Is Also One of the Wittiest, Wisest and Most Popular Members of the Diplomatic Corps; Has Longest Name

By Carolyn Bell

HE IS THE first to do real justice to the job of Dean of the Diplomatic Corps since Jusserand—sighs the old-timer. Do you mean that dapper gentleman with the clipped British accent is a South American Ambassador?—queries the newcomer. And a New Dealer, who has only been here for the past nine years, might suddenly discover he is quite the wittiest diplomat in town.

Carolyn Bell

The above being a rather involved introduction to the Dean of the Diplomats and the gentleman with the longest name in the Blue Book: the Peruvian Ambassador, Senor Don Manuel de Freyre Santander.

To one who knows him only casually, the Ambassador from Lima might seem a bit austere—but the twinkle in those gray eyes gives him away. At most official functions he is punctual, makes the usual rounds and more often than not departs quickly. But at intime gatherings it's another story. Extra men may be easier to corral in Washington these days but any hostess who can seat Freyre at her right at a dinner party is still considered a clever entertainer—war personalities notwithstanding.

While many a country has swanked up its embassy, or bought a new one in the more fashionable part of town, the Ambassador still calls the bleak, red-brick mansion on Scott Circle "home." Even a streamlined underpass couldn't move him out. And while many of our Latin friends specialize in colossal fiestas—to impress Washington—Freyre goes quietly about this business of diplomacy, with never a party-thought in his head.

A widower, he is a devoted father and spends much of his time with his two youngsters, Frank and Peggy, who have become a part of the Washington scene. Peggy, no doubt, takes after her mother who was famed for her Irish beauty. Long before the Ambassador became Dean of the Diplomatic Corps he was considered "quite a catch." And more than one Washington matron has set her cap for the gentleman—but to no avail, apparently.

Freyre (It's permissible to drop the Santander as in most Latin names), has the jump on many of his colleagues, for he not only was stationed in Washington once before—but was born here! He first saw the light of day in 1872 in the Peruvian Legation, then located in the vicinity of St. Matthew's Church. His father was at that time Peruvian Minister to this country and so it was quite natural that son, Manuel (after dabbling about), should follow in his footsteps. His background being cosmopolitan, to say the least, he has an easy grasp of international subjects. His father was of German descent while his mother hailed from Holland. Shortly after his father's death, the diplomat-to-be set off for Europe with his mother and there completed his education in England, Italy and Switzerland. He studied civil engineering as a youth—and while he may be able to build a bridge, his field is quite definitely diplomacy.

Since entering the diplomatic service of his country away back in 1902 he has been en poste in many parts of the globe. He first went to Switzerland—as a lowly attache—later to Colombia and then arrived in Washington with the rank of First Secretary. It was some time later—10 years to be exact—that he was given the rank of Minister in Washington. And there was another intervening period, during which he served in the Orient, South America and Great Britain, before he returned here as Ambassador. That was in July 24, 1930, and needless to add, he has been here ever since.

Slim of build, the Ambassador is peppy and brisk in his walk. Two of his greatest joys include a saunter down the treelined avenues of the Capital and his mid-afternoon snooze. An astute chess player, he finds son Frank is becoming harder and harder to beat.

One of the cutest stories told about Ambassador de Freyre has to do with his favorite dog. After his daily walk the envoy returned to the embassy minus the puppy at his heels. Asked where the pet was he replied "Alas, alas I fear she has entered the Convent!" Seems that the dog scampered into the grounds of Sacred Heart Convent (where Peggy attended school) and as the public is forbidden from the grounds, the Ambassador could not go after her. But evidently the canine soon tired of the restricted life for she returned to the embassy.

Dorothy Mae Stoutenburgh Is Wed to G. A. Didder, Jr.

St. Matthew's Cathedral was the scene of the wedding yesterday of Miss Dorothy Mae Stoutenburgh, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James A. Stoutenburgh, and George A. Didden, jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. Didden of Washington. The Rev. John S. Spence officiated at the ceremony.

The bride, who was given in marriage by her father, wore a gown of ivory satin made with a sweetheart neckline and full skirt falling into a train. Her veil of illusion was held in place by a coronet of seed pearls and she carried a bouquet of brides roses, stephanotis and orchids.

The matron of honor and only attendant, Mrs. O'Ferrell Estes, wore a dress of powder blue made with a fitted bodice of silk jersey and a full skirt of chiffon. Her headdress was of matching ostrich tips and veiling and she carried a bouquet of gold chrysanthemums.

Albert Didden served his brother as best man and the ushers were Frank B. Stoutenburgh, a brother of the bride, John Kester Knighton of Evansville, Ind., Harry G. Isemann and Philip C. Greenwell.

Following the ceremony a reception was held in the Burgundy Room of the Wardman Park Hotel. The couple will make their home in Washington.

Bandsmen Enter Army; Hep Cats Stranded

By Peggy Preston.

They're in the Army now and it's just too bad for the hep cats and jitterbugs.

About the only thing the latter can do is join up with Uncle Sam themselves in order to take another gander at the boys who use to roll out that hot rhythm.

The music business has been one of the hardest hit of the professions, according to such authorities as Variety, etc. They've "Gone Out of This World," all right, and dozens of members of big-name bands in the country are blowing their horns to a different tune in the Nation's service centers.

Among the top-notchers already in uniform are Artie Shaw, who is now with the Navy, and Glenn Miller, now a captain in the Army. Sammy Kaye is awaiting his call and has arranged for Tommy Ryan, his vocalist, to carry on with the band in his stead.

Johnny Long, whose orchestra was selected to play for the President's Birthday Ball last January at Uline's Arena, is exempt from service due to a lame hand, but his band is practically a shadow of its former self. Gone from its ranks are such men as Bob Houston, popular vocalist, now stationed at Camp Pickett, Va., and Ogden Davies, husband of Helen Young, a chanteuse with the band. All in all, Long has lost seven men from his group, and in the band business that is almost disastrous.

Don Cornell At Camp Stewart

To mention but a few of the other better-known musicians from "name bands," now in the service: Don Cornell, guitarist-singer with Sammy Kaye, now at Camp Stewart, West Point, N. Y.; George Brandon, saxophone player, and Lloyd Gilliam, trumpeter, in the Marines, and Ralph Flenniken, saxophonist, in the Navy. All are from Kaye's band.

The particular lament of orchestra leaders is that when men move out in groups of fours and fives, the general tenor of the group is altered. Musicians who play together get to know each man's style and his idiosyncrasies. In time their styles blend together for a harmonious effect that makes this or that band more popular than another. This "feel" that musicians achieve is the style that listeners rave about in their favorite bands.

And so the profession is resorting to the methods of other industries. Women are taking over again.

Girl Trumpeter In Band

Already Woody Herman has a girl trumpeter, Billie Rogers; and Henry King has Mary Wood on the violin. There are a few skeptics left, but the majority of musicians feel that given time, women can prove themselves as good as men in the realm of popular bands.

Even the staid National Symphony, once an all-man organization, has relaxed its rules to include five women with a sixth scheduled for rehearsals any day. They include Marguerite Kuehne, violinist; Kay Rickert, also a violinist; Louise Ehrman, cellist; Natalie Hollern, oboe and English horn player, and Sylvia Meyer, harpist. Miss Meyer, however, has been with the orchestra since its first season.

So there seems to be a solution to every problem. Cherchez la femme!

Marked with wartime simplicity was the wedding yesterday of Miss Joan Susannah Wilkinson, daughter of Rear Admiral Theodore Stark Wilkinson, and Lieut. (j. g.) George Tait Hall, U. S. N. R., which took place at 4 o'clock in St. John's Church and was followed by a small reception at the home of the bride's parents in Arlington, Va. The bridegroom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Carter Hall of Wilton, Conn.

As Admiral Wilkinson is now on duty in the Pacific, the bride was given in marriage by her cousin, Edward Whitman. She wore her grandmother's wedding gown of mellow ivory satin made with a square neck and elbow length puffed sleeves. The full skirt fell into a short train and a longer train of tulle was combined with her veil, which was held by a coronet of lace. She carried a bouquet of white orchids.

Miss Ann Harlow Wilkinson was her sister's maid of honor and the bridesmaids were Mrs. Peter Truesdale of Charlottesville, Va.; Miss Margaret Lukens of Philadelphia, Miss Marianna Evans of Washington, Miss Jane Hibbard of Grand Rapids, Mich., and Mrs. Albert Andrews of Bronxville, N. Y.

The maid of honor's gown was of violet taffeta made on simple lines with elbow sleeves, a full skirt with a ruffle at the hips. The other attendants wore gowns of the same model in hyacinth blue. All carried bouquets of rose colored chrysanthemums and wore coronets of the same flowers in their hair.

The ushers were Ensign William Stucky, U. S. N.; Lieut. Frank Rounds, U. S. N.; Hollis Seavey, U. S. N.; Lieut. Albert Andrews, U. S. N.; Lieut. Shaw Walker, U. S. N., and Capt. McKnight Kinne, U. S. A.

After a short honeymoon Lieutenant Hall and his bride will return to Washington and will be at home at 4103 W Street.

The bride attended the Madeira School and was graduated from Vassar College in June. She was presented to society in Washington in 1939.

Lieutenant Hall studied at Andover and was graduated from Yale University in 1937.

Lieut., Mrs. Gartrell At Home in Florida

Now making their home in Miami, Fla., are Lieut. and Mrs. Luther S. Gartrell, whose marriage took place recently at Miami Beach, where the bridegroom is stationed.

The bride is the former Miss Alyce Marguerite Powell, daughter of Mrs. Myrtle Powell Smith of Washington. She was graduated from the Greenville Woman's College at Greenville, S. C. Lieutenant Gartrell, who is a flight surgeon with the Army Air Corps, was graduated from the University of Arkansas. He was on the physicians staff of the Packard Company in Detroit before receiving his commission in the Army.

Miss Noce is a graduate of Southwestern University of Memphis, Tenn., and has done graduate work at the Medical School of Washington University in St. Louis, Mo. She is a member of the Alpha Omicron Pi Sorority. Her father is commander of the Army's newest organizations, the Engineer Amphibian Command. This command is a branch of the United States Army Engineers, specializing in landing operations. Miss Noce is a niece of Maj. Robert L. Cavanaugh, M. C., U. S. A., and Mrs. Cavanaugh, who are now stationed in Panama.

Captain Melody is a graduate of the University of Illinois and has done graduate work at Boston University. He was in the Cavalry Reserve and has been on active duty for two years. His present station is at Camp Edwards where he is attached to headquarters of the Engineer Amphibian Command.

The military wedding ceremony will be performed by Chaplain Lieut. Col. Joseph P. McNamara, on Saturday, November 28, in the command chapel of the Engineer Amphibian Command.

FLASH—War to Be Shortlived Now That Luis Rose Ugarta and His Career Record Are in Washington

By Patricia Grady

HERE'S THE SILVER LINING in that war cloud that you've been looking for. It is NOT going to be a long war. It can't be. Luis Rose Ugarta is in Washington on a "duration" job and he never stays longer than two years in one place.

PATRICIA GRADY

A Jack of all trades and master of many, Senor Ugarta has tried his hand at an assortment of careers, from mining to taking the first census of Peru. He is here now as an advisor to Enrique de Lozado, who in turn is an advisor on affairs Latin-American to Nelson Rockefeller. Economics is his speciality, but Senor Ugarta can also dispense advice on an assortment of subjects including public health, sanitation, labor and politics.

"I am a very good secretary," he points out as he mentions the names of numbers of outstanding Peruvians, including President Prado, whose private secretary he has been. In fact, he was such a good secretary that for a time it appeared he would be kept at it for his own "duration."

THEN CAME the Peruvian census. "It was a very necessary thing," explains the blue-eyed Latin, "for how could we, as a government, plan anything when we didn't even know how many people there were in the country. I asked for a chance to help out and was appointed chief officer of the census, working with an imported census expert."

It was quite a ticklish job to convince the people, who had never before heard of a census, that the information gathered would not be used for political, taxation, or military purposes. "We told the people we would burn all the information the minute the count was completed," continues its chief counter, "and they cooperated with us splendidly. It took over two years to do the job."

But before the two years was up, Senor Ugarta was moving on to different fields. In cooperation with the Peruvian agrarian group, he helped set up a Peruvian cotton exchange, bringing top men in from the Liverpool exchange to help with the job. Senor Ugarta stayed on just long enough to see that the exchange was operating effectively, then on to Washington and his present post.

SPEAKING ENGLISH with the idiomatic ease of a Dead End Kid, Senor Ugarta owes this language heritage to his American father. Because of the several years he spent in Bolivia with an American company, Senora Ugarta is an advisor on both Bolivia and his native Peru.

"It is necessary for me to keep up to date," says this energetic advisor, "so I write to my friends in these countries asking them for much information. They think I must be terribly important since I am in Washington—Washington is a magic name in Latin America—and that I am probably a confidential advisor to the President, so they write me lots of details about lots of things."

ABOUT A YEAR AGO, Senor Ugarta had plans made for a trip to Japan—he just thought it would be educational to see the country and study its economy—but other interests arose and he had to postpone his trip a few months. He is still promising himself that trip, but not for a few years.

Senora de Rose Ugarta and their children are in Lima and are not planning to join Senor Ugarta here. But, on the basis of his record, the family will be together again before too long. The war gods are doomed.

Something New in Jewels

Patriotic note for lapel pins is the platinum V, which dangles from the smart gray pin-stripe suit which Mrs. Jock McLean is wearing often these days while visiting in New York.

There's an airplane set upon the V heavily encrusted with diamonds and sapphires to add to the patriotic touch. Perhaps the former Agnes Pyne Bacon's penchant for airplanes comes from the planes which she and her husband turn out down in Texas, where they also run a rancho.

Lunching at the Colony Club a few days ago, Mr. and Mrs. McLean ran into Lieut. and Mrs. Douglas Fairbanks, who were with the William Rhinelander Stewarts. On leave from the Navy, Douglas Fairbanks was making his first appearance since taking part in the Commando raid on Dieppe and expects to be called back to duty immediately.

Down Virginia Way

By Nina Carter Tabb

THERE appears to be a bumper crops of new babies in northern Virginia this season, and from Army centers all over the country word continues to come in of the arival of additional members to many old-line families.

Capt. and Mrs. George Draper of Dover, Mass., have announced the arival of a son at a hospital in Durham, N. C., where Captain Draper is stationed. Mrs. Draper is the former Miss Sophie Carter Whitin of Upperville.

At a hospital in San Francisco, young Thomas Underwood Dudley was born. His father is Staff Sergt. John Rowland Dudley, U. S. Army and his mother is the former Miss Polly Walker of Richmond.

THE FORMER Miss Peggy Belt of Baltimore and The Plains and Charles Thelin Turner, announce the birth of a daughter in Baltimore.

Parents of a new daughter are Ensign and Mrs. Joe H. Tonahill. The baby was born in Alexandria, where Mrs. Tonahill is staying with her father, Judge Howard W. Smith, while her husband is overseas. She was formerly Miss Violet Smith of Fauquier County.

In Washington, Mr. and Mrs. John W. Bailey jr., are being congratulated on the arrival of a son, John Keith Bailey at Doctor's Hospital. Mrs. Bailey is the former Miss Margaret Randolph Keith of Fairfax, Va., and her husband is with the State Department.

MRS. BEVERLEY CORYELL of The Plains, announces the engagement of her daughter, Miss Virginia Beverley Coryell to Lieut. Colin Stuart Campbell, Royal Canadian Navy of Halifax, Nova Scotia, son of Mr. and Mrs. George D. Campbell of Weymouth, Nova Scotia.

The bride-elect attended St. Agnes School in Alexandria and graduated from St. Mary's Academy in Washington. She is a descendent of the Beverley, Randolph and Carter families of Virginia and is the great-granddaughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Robert Beverley of Fauquier County.

Lieutenant Campbell's mother is the former Miss Esther Black of England and is well known in Virginia, where she spent much time in Warrenton as the guest of Capt. and Mrs. Edward Carter. No date has been set for the wedding.

COBBLER Hunt held the opening meet of the season on Thursday morning at Piedmont Farm, home of Mr. and Mrs. Houston Gaddis near Marshall. Dr. Edmund Horgan and Mrs. S. Prentice Porter, were joint masters of the hunt.

Among the Capital's prospective brides are Miss Elizabeth Lee Deter (right), whose engagement to Beverly Dawes Appleton is announced; Miss Erla Bell Marshall (center), who will marry Capt. Capital Newcomers Upset Its Social Apple Cart

Big Receptions Are Few and Far Between

By Jane Eads

The influx of newcomers to the Capital, on the heels of the war, has upset the town's social apple cart, but there's gayety just the same—a new kind of gayety, without glamour.

Mrs. William E. Borah, widow of the Idaho Senator, who has lived in Washington for 37 years, says it's sort of like "trying to whistle in the dark—everyone feels kind of like he is living on the edge of a powder mill."

Afternoon teas and cocktail parties begin late, around 6 p. m., and guests linger on. The latter are called "cocktail suppers" now. The hotels are doing a boom-town business and dance floors vie with sardine tins for crowding 'em in.

The newcomers brought a night life in the way of dining spots that never before existed. There are scads of private parties, but they are small, simple and homey. Once in a while some big shot splurges with a dinner for 60 with wine and gourmet dishes.

But the "free-loading" days are gone. The fabulous balls and receptions where the guests swarmed down like locusts on the caviar and champagne, the stuffed pigs and petit fours, are few and far between, though the existing embassies and legations always entertain for the titled visitors and official delegates from foreign governments.

No Official 'At Homes' Now

For the past year there have been no receptions at the White House, no official days "at home" at the embassies and legations, or for the wives of Cabinet officers, the judiciary, the congressional and the service groups.

There have been a few private functions, or dinners, at the White House for visiting royalty and Presidents of South American countries, though after a night at the White House they are "parked" across Lafayette Square at historic Blair house for the duration of their stay.

Social lists have altered too. They include this year, for the first time, the Rockefellers, the Whitneys and the Vanderbilts. Chi-Chi Long Islanders, Chicago's Gold Coasters and Boston's Back Bayers have moved out of their expansive mansions into Georgetown flats and snug little houses in the suburbs around here.

Last year the Nelson Rockefellers were the sole representatives of the distinguished name to be found in the social directories of the Capital. This year you'll find Maj. and Mrs. James S. Rockefeller and Mr. and Mrs. John D. Rockefeller 3d.

Mrs. Altemus Whitney, better known as "Liz," is also listed, as are her former husband, Capt. John Hay Whitney, and Mrs. Whitney (the former Betsy Cushing Roosevelt, who was the first wife of the President's eldest son, James Roosevelt). Down in the "V" you'll find "Vanderbilt, Comdr. and Mrs. William H."

New York's 400 Comes to Town

Once before, New York's "400" was largely represented in Washington life. That was when Theodore Roosevelt moved into the White House. The rich and very social Perry Belmont was one of those who came down, building a French chauteau on New Hampshire Avenue which now is the property of the Eastern Star.

T. R. Didn't approve of Perry's private life and therefore kept him out of the exclusive Chevy Chase Club.

Today everybody mixes with everybody else—that is, everybody perhaps with the exception of the old aristocratic set which considers itself as revered as the exhibits in the Smithsonian Institution. Even carrying market bags and with dropstitches in their stockings, these so-called "cave dwellers" still look down their noses at the "invaders." They would as soon find themselves in a newspaper column as in the line-up in a police court.

New War Crowd Has Own Set

The new "war crowd" although mixing in social gatherings, makes sort of a social set of its own, each calling the others by their first names. They cluster together according to cities so that you could almost plot a social map at any party.

Until the war, "calling" was a major industry of Washington. It was imperative for anyone who hoped to get anywhere, or be anyone socially, to call first at the White House. Anyone who left a card there was sure to be invited to at least one function a year.

'Free-Loading' Days Are Gone For Duration

Official and social Washington were obliged to call at the executive mansion annually; on the wives of the Cabinet officers on Wednesday; their Congressional wives on Tuesdays; wives of their Senators on Thursdays and wives of the Diplomatic Corps on Fridays. Saturday, as always, the "at home" day for social Washington itself.

The mobs at the other "at homes" however, became so great that for a few years before the war, the Diplomatic Corps was only "at home" every other Friday and Cabinet wives received together.

'Must Have Been A Bore and a Chore'

Mrs. Borah believes everyone is glad the affairs have been dispensed with. They must have been a chore to give and a bore to attend.

"The first few years when I came to Washington, days at home were a solemn rite, prepared for as one prepares for a banquet, with roast hams and turkeys. They even used to serve salads," she said.

Boarding schools advertised in their catalogues that they could take their students to these affairs, and they used to arrive by the dozens, Mrs. Borah declared, adding dolefully:

"Anyone could drop in and, of course, the list of those entertaining was always published in advance.

"One day a sightseeing bus pulled up in front of our residence and the driver said to his passengers, 'this is where Senator Borah lives and Mrs. Borah is receiving today. . . .You can go in if you want to.' We had to keep an eye on them, for they tried to snatch flowers and gadgets of all kinds for souvenirs."

Navy Girl Bride of E. D. Talbert

Miss Elizabeth Helen Houghton, daughter of Mrs. James E. Houghton and the late Lieut. Comdr. Houghton, U. S. N., yesterday became the bride of Edward D. Talbert, jr., the ceremony taking place at All Saints Episcopal Church at 4 o'clock. The bridegroom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Talbert.

The Rev. Henry Teller Cocke officiated at the service and the bride was given in marriage by her grandfather, J. C. Houghton. A reception followed at the home of Col. and Mrs. E. B. T. Weidner.

The bride's gown was of white satin worn with a finger-tip length tulle veil. She carried a bouquet of white roses.

Miss Catherine Glak of Philadelphia, who was maid of honor, wore a port wine shade faille frock with a matching hat and carried a bouquet of white chrysanthemums. The bridesmaids were Miss Doris Talbert, Miss Barbara Talbert, Miss Alice Johnson and Mrs. Frank Gall. Their frocks were of hyacinth blue crepe with hats of the same color and they also carried white chrysanthemums. Frank M. Gall of Upperville, Va., was best man and the ushers were Bernard P. Dougherty, Edward T. Dougherty, John Kraft and Walter L. Borror.

Mr. Talbert and his bride will make their home in Washington.

Mrs. M. F. Rands Forsakes Art Pursuits For Volunteer Position in Defense Work

By Betty Ruth McDevitt

TIME is too rapid and days are too short, in the pinion of Mrs. Minnie Frost Rands, who has forsaken her pursuits as a poet, lecturer, playwright and feature writer to be a full-time volunteer war worker.

Not satisfied in perfecting one job in the war effort, Mrs. Rands prefers a variety of projects—at least a half dozen—thus making her the busiest war worker this writer has so far come across. Every bit of her time is devoted to war work, with weekends and holidays treated like any working day.

Although not a resident of Takoma Park, Mrs. Rands' affiliation with the Women's Club in that town led her to the war work in which she is now engaged. She lives on Floral Street, Shepherd Park, D. C., just beyond the Maryland line.

Of all the activities she is participating in Mrs. Rands considers her chairmanship of the Price Survey Project for the Consumers' Committee of OCD, the most important. As chairman of consumer problems for the D. C. Federation of Women's Clubs she was called upon to work on price relationship.

Just yesterday she inaugurated an experiment which she hopes will soon gain mementum throughout Washington. It was the Price Institute for housewives of the Trinidad area at the Stuart Junior High School. This was conducted to train women as price checkers to determine whether all merchants are cooperating with the Government's fight against inflation or whether any merchants are raising prices out of proportion to wholesale costs and disregarding ceiling prices on foods.

SHE announced plans for a mass meeting for leaders in the 66 areas of the city to be trained as checkers. Such an institute is necessary as the initial step before price checking is undertaken by the average housewife, Mrs. Rands explained, because "untrained volunteers can do more harm than good."

Since the completion in September of two price surveys made by 46 women under her direction violations have increased 40 per cent according to the OPA, Mrs. Rands pointed out. "The recent anti-inflation legislation will be of immense value to housewives but they must back up its provisions by intelligent cooperation with our Government," Mrs. Rands told the women yesterday.

She believes there is no reason why any women with one and a half hours training cannot do the work. Appealing for volunteers, Mrs. Rands said OPA wants every citizen to take a hand in seeing that they pay no more than ceiling prices for articles they buy. As for specific price checking, using the consumer committee list of 25 food items, Mrs. Rands would like to see one customer from each grocery store.

* * * *

REQUESTS for her system in price survey have poured into her committee's office from cities throughout the country. A few days ago Mrs. Rands received a request from a New York newspaper to write an article outlining the plan.

Back in February before ceiling prices were announced Mrs. Rands, accompanied by Mrs. Gladys Barber of Silver Spring, consumer chairman for the Takoma Park Women's Club, went to the Department of Agriculture to offer their services "to do something about the rising cost of living." "Do you think it worthwhile to get women interested in making price surveys?" asked Mrs. Rands of an official.

Answering in the affirmative the matter was taken up with the Bureau of Labor Statistics, OPA and the Department of Agriculture which prepared price lists for the women to begin the project.

Mrs. Rands and Mrs. Barber, who is now vice chairman of price survey for OCD, enlisted volunteers who made surveys in 100 stores from April until September. They found 15 violations out of 2700 price quotations which was one-half of 1 per cent compared to the 40 per cent increase recently announced.

Anne O'Connor, D. F. Lanahan Are Married

Currently on a northern wedding trip are Daniel Francis Lanahan and his bride, the former Miss Anne G. O'Connor, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Dennis O'Connor. He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius B. Lanahan.

Their marriage was an event of November 19, in the Holy Comforter Church. Officiating at the 6:30 service was the Rev. John B. Lanahan, cousin of the bridegroom. The bride was given in marriage by her father. She wore a gown of white satin and her train length veil was held by a pearled tiara. Her flowers were white orchids which covered a quilted satin prayerbook.

Maid of honor was Miss Catherine Roch, attired in wine velveteen and carrying a nosegay bouquet. Other attendants were Miss Marion O'Connor, Mrs. William O'Keefe and the Misses Lorette and Katherine Lanahan.

Hessler Studio

All wore costumes in velveteen and carried nosegays. John J. Walsh acted as best man and ushering were Edward Lusky, Elmer Warner and Garner O'Connor. Immediately following the ceremony a reception took place at the home of the bride's parents.

Woman's Angle on Sports

1.—The Fashion Angle

If baseball umpires can dress like men, why do football referees have to dress like urchins? . . . And doesn't it strike you that satin pants are a little bit fancy for pugilists, after all? . . . And which is considered luckier by ringside experts—the red or the purple pants? . . . And do the contenders toss a coin to see who will wear which, or what do they do about that? . . .

Nothing in the world is gaudier than a fighter's bathrobe . . . Football helmets on the ground are apt to look too much like skulls . . . A "long-underwear gang" is actually a band of corny musicians, but it always makes me think of a baseball team—what with those woolly sleeves . . . The number 5 reminds me of DiMaggio, even between seasons.

A hockey goalie in his uniform is shaped exactly like a cowboy, and it's just too bad he lacks the hat—he could stop any scoring with it . . . Tennis players must certainly be heroes to their dry cleaners . . . Do you remember the days when basketball teams arrived on the floor in their shirts and trunks, instead of in those flamboyant two-piece woollen coveralls—those sweat suits-trying-to-be-zoot suits, and in the old school colors at that—which they've adopted within recent years? They always look to me as though they were going to put on a minstrel show, or possibly a skiing contest—but no, they don't. Instead it's a strip-tease act, followed by basketball . . .

2.—The Strictly Football Angle

Women are notably softer-hearted than men, and this tender quality is nowhere more apparent than it is in football stadia. One gathers that if women had anything to say about it, there would be some changes made in the rules of the game, and in many of the attendant circumstances. To wit:

(a) The Poor Little Substitutes Hunched on the Bench would get into the game, willynilly—they would ALL get in, whether they're any good or not; and all of them win their letters automatically. It's just too mean to leave them sitting there, looking so pitiful and wistful.

(b) But since the entrance into the game of any substitute inevitably displaces a man who has been playing—usually to the latter's visible despair—there would be a corollary ruling whereby any number of men could be involved in the game at one and the same time, and NOBODY would ever have to come out—unless, of course, he was tired, or thirsty, or bored with the whole thing. In other words, unless he wanted to.

(c) The coaches of the two contending teams would not be obliged to sit on the bench and watch—they would be led away mercifully instead, and locked into padded cells, until Sunday morning. Because I mean, as things are now it's just too AWFUL, how they suffer.

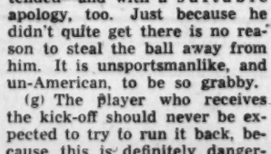
(e) The point after touchdown would either be granted automatically, or else abandoned altogether—so that there would never again be any of those 7-6 or 14-13 victories. Because of course it's just simply too grossly UNFAIR, to have the whole thing depend on that one boy who failed to make the kick (or to "convert," as the men insist on calling it—my goodness, think how he must feel! You can't even bear it yourself—though you don't even know him.



(f) Any intercepted pass would be turned over immediately to the man for whom it was intended—and with a suitable apology, too. Just because he didn't quite get there is no reason to steal the ball away from him. It is unsportsmanlike, and un-American, to be so grabby.

(g) The player who receives the kick-off should never be expected to try to run it back, because this is definitely dangerous. Furthermore, it's silly, since he rarely gets far with it. He might just as well have signalled for a fair catch and been safe.

(h) When a player is hurt, and lugged off the field, it is heartless for everybody to go right on playing as though nothing had happened. The game should stop, for at least as long as it takes a doctor to examine the disabled gladiator and determine the extent of his injuries. There should then be a public announcement as to just what his injuries are, and whether or not he is resting comfortably. If he is able to come to the microphone himself, and report, so much the better. That's the kind of reassurance the lady patrons want. Otherwise, they grieve, and speculate, and fidgit.

Author Contrasts U. S. and Europe

ALICE TISDALE HOBART

By Genevieve Reynolds
The Post Club Editor

When it comes to politics and culture, the United States still has an inferiority complex toward Europe. So believes Alice Tisdale Hobart, author of many best sellers, including "Oil For the Lamps of China," and more recently, "The Cup and the Sword."

Miss Reynolds

"We Americans do not steadily and sturdily respect our own outlook," explained Mrs. Hobart. "If we can and will do so, it is astonishing what we can do in world leadership. We have the opportunity to lead in world affairs and I hope we don't muff it."

Not that tolerant, world-minded Alice Hobart would have Americans eschew European opinions or problems. Far from it (she's much too wise)—but she thinks that we should be like a scholar who evaluates the works of others yet reaches his own independent conclusions. In other words, she believes that the United States should act upon its own convictions; not just because Europe or England advocates a particular course of action.

Post-War Conditions

In expressing these ideas, gracious, friendly Mrs. Hobart made it clear that she was referring to post-war conditions, not the present.

While we sat chatting over a dish of delectable lobster newburg, quite naturally the conversation shifted to China. This authority on China—she lived there 16 years—says that she is rediscovering America. Back home from the Orient, she wrote "The Cup and the Sword"—laid the scenes in California, where she has been living. Now, with her husband in the Army Specialist Corps—she'll be in Washington for the duration.

About China she remarked: "It should be easy to get along nicely with them. The Chinese peoples' ideas and ideals of democracy are compatible with ours. Always they have had democratic ideas and ideals—even when they were under foreign rule and could not carry them out.

Tells of Town Father

She told of the town father, who presided at the meetings in the Chinese towns and villages. Comparing them to our old-fashioned town meetings, Mrs. Hobart said: "My husband seldom called in the law for any misunderstanding that arose in China. Instead he took the problem to the town father. He called a meeting, the pros and cons of the matter were discussed and usually settled amicably."

Now when Mrs. Hobart went to visit her sister Moss Mary A. Nourse, who was teaching in Gin Ling College in China, she found that the Chinese people weren't so sure that the Americans weren't illiterate. Laughingly, she said, "That's what I thought of them. But, you see, we were both wrong."

She added: "It's strange how each country or nation thinks the other one so illiterate and lacking in culture—that is until the races mingle and get to know each other, something about the culture and education."

Since the United States has all races represented on its soil, Mrs. Hobart sees no reason why we can't reach an understanding with all nationalities. For we have the nucleus of an understanding. To illustrate her point she pointed out that workers of 50 nationalities were laboring together in a winery in California. Just how well the races mingled is told in her book, "The Cup and the Sword."

Likes People Best

Intensely interested in the mingling of races and cultures, she admits that she likes nothing better than people. In fact, she talks with them wherever she meets them—on streetcar, in the fields, along the road, in theaters. Listing people as her first interest, she admits that traveling comes second following by gardening, another of her hobbies.

Never the propagandist—more the mirror of her favorite subjects. Slim, quiet-spoken with blue-gray bobbed hair, she gives the impression of a student who looks facts in the face—she doesn't just theorize. Her writings—mostly of China—contain many revealing glimpses, some amusing, some tragic, behind inscrutable Oriental faces.

'Every Woman for Herself on Girdle Question,' Says Woman Reader, Who Sensibly Reminds Us That What Suits One Figure Won't Do for Another

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: People who try to impose their personal tastes upon others give me a pain. I am referring in this instance to certain self-satisfied, ungirdled women who have written you recently, apropos of the corset controversy, who seem to think that what suits them ought to suit all other women. May I remind them that women's shapes are as different as their faces? And that the individual woman of normal intelligence will, therefore, work out the girdle question with simple reference to her own figure needs.

I know a few women—but very few—who need no girdle at all, except when wearing a skin-fit dress; others who require a lightweight garment to give smooth lines; and still others who need a good substantial support. So, let each woman react to the girdle question as she would to any other item of dress—learning what is most suitable for her and then sticking to it, regardless of conflicting views.

As for myself, I have a streamlined figure. It happens to be a family characteristic. My mother had that kind of figure; and so did my grandmother. And I have engaged in sports all my life, as well as exercised for "fitness" to boot. But never have I been able to eliminate the hereditary roundness of my hips, which, though certainly not flabby, nevertheless rotate noticeably when I walk sans girdle—which causes me to consider a girdle a necessary article of public dress. My favorite is a lightweight pantie girdle, with a panel of two-way stretch in back, to smooth the roundness a bit. And while this is all I need, I certainly would not tell all women to copy my choice. But because it is a pretty little garment, made of mesh and smartly styled, it might solve the problem of the wife who originally wrote you November 7, saying that her husband objected to her wearing a girdle, because he thinks it gives her "the corseted appearance of a much older woman."

But Modern Girdle IS Dainty Garment

And, speaking of pretty girdles, I wish "Office Wife," your correspondent of November 17, would take a look at the variety of lovely, silken-soft, lightweight garments that have been on the market for years. You remember she says: "There has always been something distinctly unattractive to me about these gray-pink elastic contraptions, buttressed with laces and stays and dangling garters." Because she doesn't wear a girdle herself, it must be that she never sees them in the shops and still thinks of a foundation garment in terms of the cumbersome harness that women squeezed themselves into a generation ago.

Dr. George W. Crane, who writes a syndicated column on problems in psychology (and with whom I would favorably compare you, Miss Haworth), once discussed a case similar to the problem posed by the girdle dispute which initiated these letters. He said girdle wearing must be classed in the same category with the wearing of false teeth or a dental bridge; or with the wearing of eyeglasses, or other combined utilitarian and beautifying devices. Granted that a woman should exercise to keep a good figure, just as she should take care of her eyes, her teeth and her skin, that doesn't mean that she should be denied, or disdain, an available "crutch," if she happens to need one. What difference does it make, and whose business is it but hers, if she wears her "aid" in the front of her mouth or over her torso, so long as its psychological or hygienic value gives her a lift and sets her free of blighting self-consciousness?

MRS. SENSIBLE.

Lady Takes Poke At Presumptuous Male

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: Mr. E. A. F., your dauntless correspondent of last Sunday, who stuck his neck into this girdle controversy, might do all right on some other subject of debate. But I think he should leave this particular topic to the medical profession and the fashion experts. Taking his stand with the muscle-control advocates, he says: "The use of a girdle, or any firm support, is a serious mistake, from the health standpoint. Such coddling inevitably weakens the muscles, etc." Much he knows about it! A woman with muscles so "controlled" or bodily dimensions so concave that she doesn't need a girdle is usually the type described as "painfully thin." (And the painfully thin woman, incidentally, is the one most apt to be suffering from "dropped stomach," simply because she lacks the abdominal wall of flesh needed to keep her organs in place. She is the type who should wear a girdle, on physician's prescription!)

But anyway, to spit on my hands and get back to my needling: Mr. E. A. F. says, "A still greater objection to girdles is the direction of false emphasis to physique. Your girdle wearer is indorsing the specious theory that a woman's principal charm is bodily attraction . . . but physique can be duplicated endlessly, whereas the play of expression across a face, the pattern of thought, the originality of mind, etc., alone have the possibility of being different. And here is where personality comes in." Now, in my opinion, it is only the well-girdled woman who can concentrate 100 per cent on personality play. She doesn't have to worry about whether her tummy is sagging or her hips protruding, as she lets go with the infinite variety.

Likens His Views To Walden Pond Essay

Seriously speaking, however, the only women who are justified in trying to get by without a girdle are the poor short-waisted creatures, who look much slimmer in the middle if they don't have to bunch themselves into a two-way restraining garment. But the long-waisted gal always looks much better in a girdle, because it gives her a lift—and a smooth-flowing line. The difference between the girdled and the ungirdled figure may be likened to the difference between a yacht and a tugboat. I think Mr. E. A. F. ought to know that. Of course, he may be a Turk. If he is, then tell him to please excuse my girdle—and my dust. But it's too bad he couldn't have seen the play of expression across my face and followed the pattern of my thought as I read his Walden Pond oration!

Miss Haworth will be glad to help you in solving your problems. Write her in care of The Post Woman's Page.

The Shop Scout

Women have been called the practical sex. If you're managing a household, you jolly well know you have to be practical, or your household machinery will rattle, stall, or just plain "bust"! One way to show your practicality is by budgeting—maybe you do it only in your mind and not on paper, but you do it. So much for food, for clothes, for beauty, for comfort and for amusement. Now I'm in a position to pretty well know where to get "the most for the least." If the attractive offerings in my column seem very remote from your own doorstep, which, you think, has become too wolf-conscious, try to make both ends meet and "feed the brute," for you must try to make that budget elastic enough to include things which tend to make life very much more worth living.

Picture Yourself—

By Jeanne Contini

"L85," "Duration," "Simplification," are now bread-and-butter conversation. War is bound to exert a tremendous influence on fashion. The standards of good taste narrow down, and presumably regulate the showy knock-em-dead kind of costumes to the shelf for the time being. We expected that clothes would have a new look—a fine simplicity stripped of unnecessary gewgaws. Instead everything from head to toe glittered, tasseled, fringed, and feathered as though we were indulging in a last swim in a sea of decorations before going into sack cloth forever. The way things looked, with good luck and good hunting you could find a lovely simple something which good designers have always made, but for a price. We are delighted to report that the trimming fever which apparently seized even the best of them is apparently on its way out. The good unadorned clothes are beginning to make an unobtrusive entrance on the scene.

To prove you don't have to look like an old picture of Theda Bara, we show you the above suit, coat and dress. In them, YOU are the center of interest. There is nothing going on about these clothes that clamors for attention, but you'll be noticed for your personality, your quiet distinction—not for a mad little hat or a jittery-glittery porcupine skirt. These clothes will preserve their freshness for a long time. To own them requires no tightening of belts as they are priced for a moderate budget.

The coat is a fitted reefer of suede-like woolen, which boasts only fine tailoring and superb cut. The collar is notched high so you can tuck a scarf in the neckline or show the bow of your blouse. The skirt flares just enough for grace and walking freedom. Wear the coat around the shoulders of a suit or over your afternoon clothes with a muff or fur piece. It's wonderful in red or winter white . . . blue or black if you prefer—about $40.

Pure wool gabardine makes the suit. Experience has proven this fabric can take it like nothing else . . . it tailors perfectly and resists wrinkles. The pockets and lapels have a hand-picked edging. It fits beautifully and would become any type of figure. All in all it is a timeless suit that you can wear everywhere . . . which makes an excellent investment. It is very attractive in all of its colors . . . the pastels are pretty but the chocolate brown and bottle green require less care . . . about $35.

The dress is a discovery! Everything about it spells fine design and good sense. It is the success dress of the season brought down within the range of the most demanding budget. There's nothing to it . . . especially on the hanger. Just a sheathe, a pair of sleeves, and a cord. But put it on and see what is does for you. The cord adjusts the drapery to your particular figure which results in the expert fit of a first-class dressmaker. This dress looks as though the price might be anywhere between $20 and $80. Actually it is around $18. It comes in black, gray, or blue.

INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION

(Editor's note: War is bringing a revolution in the traditional thinking about the strengths and weaknesses of women. Amy Porter, Associated Press special writer, describes this revolution, after a Coast-to-Coast inspection trip of war plants, and a survey of the new attitudes of management, unions and Government toward women in industry.)

By Amy Porter

New York, Nov. 21 (AP).—It seems there were two girl workers in the cafeteria of the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. . . .

One boasted she was learning to read a micrometer "to make things come out right to a thousandth of an inch."

Said the other girl, "That's wonderful. How many thousandths do you 'spose there are in an inch?"

And the micrometer reader answered "I don't know but there must be millions!"

A Firestone official told me he overheard this conversation, and, in the course of a tour of war plants, I heard many other off-the-beam comments from the new war-working women, showing that some of them don't yet know quite what it's all about.

Nevertheless, and in spite of minor confusions, these women have managed to accomplish an industrial revolution all their own within a very short time:

They have brought about the first large-scale unionization of women.

Won Equal Pay

They have won the first assurance-with-teeth-in-it of equal pay in a recent War Labor Board decision.

They have caused a wholesale setting aside of protective legislation for women.

These three developments are of more importance to the future status of women in industry than the mere multiplication of their numbers.

Of the three, unionization probably will have the most far-reaching effect. It marks a sharp break with the past. It means that men who traditionally have disliked and feared the competition of women workers, now are accepting them.

Union officials say it means industrial suffrage for women, who heretofore have depended upon men, management and the law to decide when and where and how they shall work.

Late in September the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers (A. F. L.) voted to accept women members, and more than 3000 women at the Kaiser shipyards in Portland already have their union cards.

Yet the boilermakers, an old and conservative brotherhood of craftsmen, last summer violently opposed admitting women. The opposition trotted out every possible argument, including ridicule. Imagine a lady boilermaker, they said.

Besides, a woman wasn't strong enough for the work. With the law forbidding her to lift more than 25 pounds, how could she wield a sledge hammer? She would work for less pay than a man and so undercut labor standards. She would have a new-broom enthusiasm and do her work so quickly as to cause a revision of speed standards.

How about after the war? Wouldn't she keep the job a returning soldier needed? Her place was in the home anyway.

Refused Admittance

This was the state of affairs when I visited the Moore Drydock Co. in California several weeks ago, and found that boilermakers and machinists refused to permit women to do work for which they were eminently fitted—precision machine work, the operation of lathes, the making of molds. Management charged that the "rigidity of the union" was holding back production.

But the girls were going to work, obviously, with or without union blessing, because the country needed them. So, reluctantly, the union gave its blessing and annexed the strength—and dues—of thousands of women workers. And it immediately set about to pull female working standards up to the level of male standards.

Oddly enough, women apparently took little part in the arguments. Judging by conversations with them, they wanted only to work.

Evelyn Dishman, 17-year-old welder at the Kaiser yards (closed A. F. L. shop), didn't know or care whether the union would admit her. She wiped the sweat from her face with a grimy glove and told me, "All I know about the union is I have to pay them $30 within 30 days for something, and it's all right with me as long as I keep on making $62.40 a week."

Miss Dishman got her card as a member of Local 72 the first week in October.

The boilermakers were almost the last outpost of union resistance to women. On the West Coast generally, and particularly in the young, liberal-minded airplane industry, women are and for at least a year have been welcomed into the unions (mostly C. I. O.). Everywhere vertical unions embracing entire industries, whether C. I. O. or A. F. L., admit women more readily than horizontal, craft unions.

Equal Pay for Work

Women do understand the second phase of their feminine industrial revolution—getting equal pay with men for equal work.

Before the war, women's pay was consistently lower than men's—except in Michigan where such discrimination was a misdemeanor. And the unions condoned this situation, since women held only inferior "women's jobs" and weren't numerous anyway. Pay differentials based on sex were written into many prewar union contracts.

The National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, the Woman's Party, the Women Lawyers' Association all feel that "protective" legislation is in effect discriminatory, and should be abolished to assure women real industrial equality.

Besides, management gives evidence of realizing that good working conditions and reasonable hours promote efficiency. Executives in almost every plant I visited said they avoided long hours and 7-day weeks except in extreme emergencies because such measures had a bad effect on stamina and morale for men and women alike.

For the duration, at least, women have won union privileges, pay privileges, and the privilege of not being protected.

Whether the status quo will hold after the war, nobody knows. But a good many employers are willing to bet they'll keep a fair share of their women employes, because they have proved so good.

An Army Nurse Writes Home

By Army Nurse Willetta S. Mosser

(Editor's note: The Associated Press asked that an Army nurse write a story about her life, work, entertainment and relaxation on duty abroad. Just offhand, Second Lieut. Willetta S. Mosser, 29, of Waban, Mass., was chosen by the head nurse of her group and the following "Letter to All Back Home" is the result. It is interesting and human, an appealing glimpse of the life of United States nurses abroad.)

With U. S. Army in Northern Ireland, Nov. 21 (AP).—Dear folks back home—

Your letters have been grand—can't tell you what it does for our morale when we get off duty to find a neat little stack of news from the good old U. S. A. But prevalent in all these letters, those of the other girls as well as mine, runs the idea we are caught up in a glorious task and that we have given up great luxuries to undertake a hard and grim job. That is what I want to talk to you about.

We hate to feel that the folks at home are worying about us in any way. It is probably because of the great story of those gallant women of Bataan who truly gave of themselves so unselfishly. Theirs is very probably an isolated case in this war. None of us will ever have to go through all that they did.

Now things have been so well organized and planned that our life has been made easier because of their heroic efforts. So please keep always in mind the fact that we are comfortably situated and very happy in our work.

In the Country

We are at present working at a hospital in rural area of northern Ireland. Our billets are huts. Perhaps you've seen pictures of them over there; dome-shaped affairs, tin-roofed and finished off inside with brick and beaverboard painted cream color with a light green trim.

Each one of us was given at the start, a room to ourselves complete with bed, chair, clothes closet and the all-important coal stove. I certainly felt helplessly overcivilized when first I saw that object! Can't you see me building a fire after all those years in a comfortable steam-heated New York apartment! But of necessity we rapidly mastered the art of fire building as the British summer is mighty unlike our own.

As soon as we moved in we started a hunt for packing crates, nails and the like with which we fashioned bureaus of sorts. You know the old orange-crate trick. Pictures were hung on the walls, books set out and soon our little hut compartments were worthy of the name "home."

Bought Bicycles

At least half of the bunch bought bicycles as soon as they could get their hands on them. They cost from 7 to 10 pounds apiece. You know that's from $28 to $40. I found one second-hand, not a thing of beauty but utility in the last word. Since we are well out in the country, we find riding a grand sport and often a necessity because of the transportation problem.

We have a recreation hut nearby which, when we arrived, was bare as Mother Hubbard's cupboard; but several ingenious and gifted young men and women fixed it up beautifully. They found some gay linen which worked in well with the cream and green color scheme and made curtains for all the windows in the two large common rooms.

Then one of the doctors, a talented painter, did two murals. His first was a view of a huge modern hospital in the States. It is truly a work of art. His next was a scene of an Atlantic convoy, really just a lookout at the bow of a ship but very effective and interesting to all of us who had made such a trip.

Gave First Party

When we finally added couches, chairs, radio and bridge tables we had a swell place in which to entertain our friends, for friends we made and very quickly. Almost as soon as the final curtain was hung we gave our first party. For music we had a soldier orchestra and very good they were, too. It was a perfectly grand dance just like any at any officers' club.

You would be very surprised to see how happy everyone is. You might expect us to be awfully homesick; but we're not. I don't mean to be callous; of course, we miss our families and friends but there are so many of us here together that it is nearly like being home after all.

The people over here have been grand to us. We met a darling young married couple who invited us for tea one Sunday. Little did we realize the extent or scope of a high tea! They must be rationed to the bone but you never would have known it as this feast.

The more I see of these people the less foreign they become. How can anyone feel that we are not all really alike? I guess it's the British accent that scares most of us off. We have come to think of it as an affectation—just an example of the influence of the movies, when actually they are merely speaking English.

To them we are Americans, all alike in every respect, and I shall never forget the day we were riding with a southern boy and the children called out "hi, Yankee." You could have called him a "limey" and he would have minded less.

Learned to Do Without

Well, I should tell you something of our work. This is a good-sized hospital and we have a wonderful experience in getting it started. You know how it is at home, call X-ray and get an appointment immediately; call the pharmacy or supply room for anything you need. Well, believe it or not we can just about do that here because we have learned to do without so many things that we get along beautifully with very little.

The patients are grand—all fine American boys anxious to get well to get back to their jobs. They are not too sick, some of them, so the problem is one of keeping them amused and out of mischief. A wonderful arts and crafts room was started here from absolutely scratch. One of the majors and the chaplain realized immediately that there was a crying need for occupational therapy for the convalescent patients. So these two and a nurse picked an empty ward and from this bare beginning fashioned a truly remarkable workshop.

Among the soldiers were several fine artists who started on the walls, as in our recreation hut, with gay murals of country scenes; others built sturdy tables, bookcases, planes, built toys and dolls houses so that now there is always a busy hum of activity in this room.

Make Christmas Toys

One always thinks of reed baskets in connection with occupational therapy; but here real ingenuity has developed some very fine and worthwhile work. Now the boys are collecting voluntary contributions for material with which to make toys for the poor children for Christmas. Doesn't that make you proud of our boys?

There is, as in all Army hospitals, the Red Cross building. Here the boys play ping-pong, listen to the radio, play the piano and phonograph records—real "hot swing" from home. The Red Cross workers are always there to help the boys with their personal affairs and they do a good job as always.

We wear our regular hospital uniforms, caps and all, at work, and our blue uniforms off duty. It is an Army regulation that all its members are to be in uniform at all times; but you know women! You should get a peek into our mess hall where there is so much imagination applied to the uniform that nearly every girl is in complete and separate attire from the others.

We can wear slacks in our quarters and for bicycling and it was quite a headache for our chief nurse to get us out of violently-hued sweaters into our more somber navy blue for the sake of uniformity! We are pretty well in hand now, finally have gotten accustomed to the necktie, at first such a trial, and upon repeated assurances from nearly all the men that we look so attractive in blue, are becoming convinced that maybe they're right!

Well Fed

What more can I tell you except that we're very well fed. The food is shipped to us and it is a thrill to get peanut butter and jam and pickles out of a can with a real American label. Don't picture us suffering in any way; for after all, you people at home are working for us and sending us everything we need.

And now I must stop for it is time to draw rations. That is a high point in our week, when we stand in line for our cigarettes, candy, books, writing paper, and beer (yes, real U. S. A. in cans!). We buy everything we can and always have more than we need, but it's such a temptation and the sergeant and his men are very clever salesmen.

Yes, it is a great life; wouldn't have missed it for the world and though I said we aren't homesick, please write—make it air mail—and soon! Cheerio.

Thrift Shop Aids Child Welfare With Its Profits

Fourteen years ago this month a shop was born whose slogan became, "We Turn Your Trash Into Cash" . . . and your trash was turned into cash for child-welfare organizations and projects all over the city of Washington.

The Thrift Shop, located at 425 Tenth Street Northwest, was born and has grown into a business large enough to support or maintain in part the prenatal clinic at Columbia Hospital, the social service department at Children's Hospital (Junior League), St. John's Orphanage, the Children's Country Home and the Child Welfare Clinic at Children's Hospital.

In 1928 Mrs. John Allan Dougherty, as chairman of the Child Welfare Association, saw how the returns from all kinds of rummage could do a job for children. Gradually other organizations doing child welfare work were invited to become members, and today six organizations are participating in the Thrift Shop.

Art on Sale

Besides maintaining a constant rummage sale, the shop maintains a "commission" room, where many objets d'art are placed for sale. The Thrift Shop retains a small commission for administrative expenses. Mrs. William A. Graham, manager of the shop, was once asked if she would accept three angora cats in her "commission" room. Mrs. Graham assured her patron that the cats would get lonesome with only fine glass and rugs and old silver pieces to purr at.

Odd among the phone requests was one man who begged the Thrift Shop to furnish his entire apartment from the stock. It could have been done—so complete is the stock, but the Thrift Shop is concerned only with selling on its premises.

A day at the shop is an education in itself. One woman bought a lovely single lounging slipper, saying she could keep the other foot out of sight as she reclined on her chaise lounge. Recently two hideous dress forms were purchased for "statues." The loveliest Oriental rug from the "commission" room became the property of an Army wife who has searched long for a particular shade of peacock blue in a rug.

Last week an aware young man picked up two prints of another era. The Duchess of Kent and her lady-in-waiting made wonderful twin pictures—and the date of the prints was exhibited plainly, 1820. A well-known Washington costume expert finds many interesting "creations" among the racks of dresses and coats. The book department yields first editions and old dictionaries, as well as an occasional best seller.

Thrift Shop Personnel

Mrs. John R. Williams is chairman of the Thrift Shop board. Mrs. Reeve Lewis and her assistant, Mrs. Cuthbert Train, are chairmen of the finance committee. Mrs. James H. Patten is recording secretary and Mrs. Archibald Davis is corresponding secretary. Board members of six organizations who support the Thrift Shop are Mrs. Richard Wilmer, Mrs. D. Buchanan Merryman, Mrs. John Wilkins, Miss Abbie B. McCammon, Mrs. Edward B. Meigs, Mrs. Barry Mohun, Mrs. Alfred Hand and Mrs. J. Lawn Thompson, jr.

Mrs. John Allan Dougherty is chairman of the food sales which take place every Friday at the shop. Mrs. Barry Mohun is chairman of volunteer service.

Committee chairmen are Mrs. William Guthrie, Mrs. Frank C. Letts, Mrs. Charles Bradley, Mrs. H. H. Kerr, Mrs. Ormsby McCammon and Mrs. Henry W. Miller.

Though donations come from the participating organizations, the public is asked to contribute its rummage to the Thrift Shop to help support the child welfare work of the community.

Junior League Thrift Shop

D. A. R. to Honor Servicemen, Warworkers at Open House

Young women warworkers and servicemen will be the guests of the national defense committee, D. C. D. A. R., at their first open house, to be held from 4 to 7 p. m. today in the chapter house. Fifteen District of Columbia chapters are sponsoring this affair, and their regents or representatives will assist Mrs. George C. Ober, jr., chairman.

The following Congresswomen will be on hand to greet guests: Representative Katherine E. Byron of Maryland, Representative Edith Nourse Rogers of Massachusetts, Representative Mary T. Norton of New Jersey, Representative Jessie Sumner of Illinois, Representative Margaret S. Smith of Maine, and Representative Frances P. Bolton of Ohio.

Other events on the D. A. R. calendar this week include:

A meeting of Victory Chapter at 2 p. m. tomorrow at the home of Mrs. William H. Harper, 3456 Macomb Street Northwest, at which time Mrs. Frank B. Steele, a vice president of the Daughters of American Colonists, will discuss "Niagara Frontier," and Mrs. Arthur C. Houghton will speak on two defense projects the national defense committee has undertaken, a mobile unit for the blood donor center and Christmas buddy bags for soldiers.

Miss Maude E. Aiton will discuss the Americanization School at a meeting of the Livingston Manor Chapter, to be held at 2 p. m. Tuesday in the chapter house. Mrs. Addams S. McAllister is acting as hostess.

Also scheduled for Tuesday is a meeting of the Columbia Chapter at 7:30 p. m. at the home of Mrs. John H. Ray, 5223 Reno Road Northwest. Mr. Victor S. Mersch, deputy register of wills in the District of Columbia, will describe some interesting and amusing provisions of wills he has observed. Following the usual Thanksgiving custom, members will bring groceries to fill a basket for the Central Union Mission.

Mrs. Swann Sinclair, national chairman of the D. A. R. Magazine, will speak at a meeting of the Our Flag Chapter, to be held Tuesday at the home of Mrs. Mason Smith.

Dr. John C. Wright, assistant commissioner of education, United States Office of Education, will describe his observations while on a special mission to Mexico this past July to study the educational system of that country, at a meeting of the filing and lending committee to be held Friday evening. Dr. Wright will illustrate his talk with technicolor movies. The musical program is under the direction of Mrs. J. Nelson Anderson.

A luncheon and card party will be sponsored by the E Pluribus Unum Chapter at 1:30 p. m. Saturday at the home of the regent, Mrs. William Schreinert, 3808 Garfield Street Northwest.

Mrs. Earle W. Sapp, vice regent of the American Liberty Chapter, will be hostess at a silver tea for members and their friends from 3 to 6 p. m., Sunday, November 29, at her home, 1331 Kalmia Road Northwest.

Catholic Group Will Hear C. U. Rector

Right Rev. Msgr. Patrick J. McCormick, acting rector of the Catholic University of America, director of the International Federation of Catholic Alumnae, and a member of the District of Columbia Chapter, will be principal speaker at the biennial conference of the chapter to be held at 3 p. m. today at the Georgetown Visitation Convent. Miss Christabel E. Hill, chapter governor, will preside at the meeting. Miss Hill is a member of the executive board of the Georgetown Convent Alumnae Association, and Mrs. Edward Keating, chairman of the reception committee, is president of that association.

Miss Mabel R. Wingate of Baltimore, Md., national president of the International Federation of Catholic Alumnae, will attend the conference and outline the federation schedule for the coming season. Miss Wingate was elected president at the national convention held in Newark during the past summer and this will be her first official visit to Washington.

A small supper at the Parrot Tea Room, has been arranged by Miss Hill, retiring governor in honor of Miss Wingate, the newly elected and out-going officers.

Servicemen To Get Yule 'Buddy Bags'

Thousands of men in the service of the Army, Navy and Marine Corps will receive unusual Christmas gifts next month sent to them by members of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

They are small kits called "Buddy Bags" and it is hoped that by next April at least 150,000 of the bags will be in use by men in the various war zones or in the naval service.

Mrs. William A. Becker of Summit, N. J., an honorary president general is national director of the Buddy Bag project, one of the special programs of the D. A. R. relating to the war effort.

The bags are 12 by 14 inches or 18 by 18 inches in size, made of heavy durable material. They contain various articles such as razor blades, shaving cream, soap, comb and mirror, a shoe polishing cloth, sewing articles, writing paper, cigarettes, small books, greeting cards, tooth brush, tooth paste, nail file, playing cards, etc.

"Chapters of the D. A. R. are sending the Buddy Bags to Army camps, Coast Guard stations, naval hospitals, naval stations and air training camps, both abroad and in their own States.

"The project has gone forward in New Jersey for the past two years and Buddy Bags have been made for all branches of the service as well as for hospitals and the merchant marine.

"They are wanted in hundreds of places. The larger bags make good bedside bags for the men in hospitals. Their usefulness is unlimited."

Although no more bags can be distributed in time for Christmas, the work of making them will proceed at full speed, Mrs. William H. Pouch, president general, announces.

"I ALSO SERVE"

The nurse at Bataan, the Russian girl-sniper, the English woman at an anti-aircraft gun, the woman-welder . . . they're able to serve in action. I envy them that, and I'm proud to know that women today can share in the burdens and dangers of the war.

I work for the United Nations in my own way . . . as every government clerk and every mother of a family should. I give my blood to the Red Cross, study First Aid, serve as an air-warden, spend hours at the USO and the Stage Door Canteen.

But that's not enough—not when I hear of our soldiers across the sea, in desperate need of equipment! Not when Victory may depend on the greater number of planes, guns and machinery! That's why I thrilled to hear that I and 43,000,000 women like me are to serve actively in "Women at War" week

Final Group Of Monticello Homes Shown

Monticello Development Corporation is showing a last group of homes in Monticello Estates, Va., where no more will be constructed until the end of the war. These final dwellings are presented by J. Garrett Beitzell, realtor, and will be welcomed by house shoppers desiring generous room sizes, convenient arrangement, distinctive design and fine equipment in residential offerings.

The subdivision and its remaining houses may be inspected by the following easy route: Cross Memorial Bridge to Arlington National Cemetery; proceed left on Arlington Ridge Road along the ridge to Mount Vernon Avenue; continue past Presidential Gardens Apartments and bear right on Russell Road. (A map showing directions is inserted in this article.)

A featured residence has been made particularly fascinating to visitors through its artistic furnishings. Interior decorators of Julius Lansburgh Furniture Co., have selected period pieces demonstrating in a most revealing way, the decorative possibilities of the rooms and permitting fullest exhibition of the house as a true home.

Spaciousness characterizes these homes, each of which has three bedrooms and two baths. Besides the living room, dining room and kitchen, there are a large sunroom and adjoining study with built-in bookshelves and desk on the first floor. The showings also have modern powder rooms with mirrored vanity stands, lavatories and cloak rooms adjacent to the reception foyers.

In conformity with the generous floor planning, dining room, sunroom, master bedroom and living room are exceptionally large, dimensions of the last-named being 21.9 by 12 feet. Wide picture windows augment the cheerful brightness of these portions and the light of the kitchens is increased by glass block panels as well as the windows. These kitchens are the latest in efficient arrangement and have refrigerators of modern styling and 7 cubit foot capacity, built-in radio sets, chromium-lined gas ranges, all-steel matched cabinets and double drainboards with sprayers.

Every one of these houses con-

Savings, Loan Units Aided War Housing

Chicago, Nov. 21.—The $161,670,000 which savings, building and loan associations have supplied during the first nine months of 1942 to finance construction has contributed 49,000 new units of shelter, almost entirely in war industry areas. This was one major activity of these institutions to further the war program cited by Fermor S. Cannon, Indianapolis, president of the United States Savings and Loan League, in his address before the league's war conference on housing and savings this week.

He said that the "knotty questions incident to rent control" have placed added responsibility in the hands of home financing institutions and that counsel and guidance have been given to thousands of members of the savings, building and loan associations throughout the country.

Can Remodel Existing Units

"We have before us the opportunity to cooperate in remodeling existing housing units," he continued. "Our loaning task is changed somewhat in character, but it is still possible to devise ways and means to assist within the framework of the current regulations. Some of the war housing we have financed has been of the "mass production housing" type, a fact which should encourage all of us as to our ability to meet such problems when housing is once more permitted on a peacetime scale. Even under the current reduced specifications governing war housing we should find opportunity to provide funds for housing which is one war activity still causing Nation-wide concern."

Cannon urged that no barrier be placed on prepayment of home loans by borrowers whose incomes have been swollen by war work.

"This program of more rapid repayment is an added safety valve for controlling the spending of available funds," he said.

Since the war conference of the league was its fiftieth annual meeting, he reviewed some of the highlights of the half century of this national organization of the savings, building and loan associations.

"The pioneers of our business were facing a crisis in our affairs at the end of the 1880's," he pointed out. "The problem of their day involved the attempt to nationalize the operations of associations using the well-developed formula of the locally operating associations. Cooperation in the effort to control this situatoin was obtanied through the formation of a national league.

"The next forward step in our operations was the attempt to gradually better statutes in the various States to insure the safety of the associations. Then came the evolution and realization of the Federal Home Loan Bank system, through the efforts of the United States League, which great system of Reserve Home Loan Banks has greatly fortified our services to our country."

FHA Program Mobilizing Private Funds

Private investment funds totaling approximately one billion dollars have been mobilized under the FHA program thus far this year to finance war-housing projects, essential repairs and remodeling for war workers, and amortized financing of sound existing home properties, Federal Housing Commissioner Abner H. Ferguson announced yesterday.

This brought the total volume of private loans advanced under the FHA program since the start of the war emergency period in the early summer of 1940 to approximately $2,775,000,000, Ferguson said, in part.

Of the loans insured by the Federal Housing Administration thus far this year, about $680,000,000 represents mortgages financing 155,000 new dwelling units, substantially all of which were built for occupancy by war workers. In addition, FHA commitments are outstanding to insure mortgages of over $400,000 on more than 100,000 dwelling units for war workers now under construction or scheduled for early construction.

Outside the new construction field, mortgages of approximately

The Week in Real Estate

By Thomas M. Cahill

Urging real estate owners and taxpayers to win the support of their Mayors, Governors and Congressmen for House Joint Resolution 326, now before Congress, Lawrence G. Holmes, secretary of the National Council of Real Estate Taxpayers, outlined conflicts and competition in taxation between the three levels of Government as indicative of the necessity for a change, before the annual meeting of the council last week.

HOLMES

The current proposal, H. J. R. 326, Mr. Holmes explained, would establish a national commission to study the problem of tax integration and chart a course which can be presented to the legislative bodies of States, cities and the Federal Government. It was proposed by Representative John M. Coffee of Washington and is one of several such measures which have been urged to Congress. At present the bill is in the House Rules Committee and has not been scheduled for action.

H. J. R. 326, Mr. Holmes concluded, has the support of the National Council of Real Estate Taxpayers and various State and local constituent groups such as savings and loan associations, real estate boards, etc. He urged all interested groups actively to seek to break down the congressional inertia which continues to prevent the proposal from coming up for consideration and action.

During the past week the Real Estate Commission issued licenses as brokers to Meadowbrook, Inc., and Monroe Warren, 1003 East-West Highway, Chevy Chase, Md. Licenses as salesmen were granted to Agnes Whiting Fahrney, 1022 Seventeenth Street Northwest; William H. Drayton, jr., Shoreham Building; Fred A. Duffy, Room 413, 1010 Vermont Avenue Northwest. A license as a business chance salesman was also given to Mr. Duffy.

Applications for licenses as brokers were received from Carlisle R. Stephenson, Room 410, 1343 H Street Northwest and D. G. Joseph, 6101 Dix Street Northeast. An application for a license as a salesman was received from Harold F. Gates, 107 Carroll Street, Takoma Park, D. C.

The Mortgage Bankers Association of America, whose members either manage or are represented by the financing of more than 13 billion dollars of real estate, are becoming active in a drive to tap large stores of salvage which heretofore has not been available to the scrap drive, Charles A. Mullenix, president, announces.

MULLENIX

Purpose of the drive, which is being undertaken under auspices of the American Industries Salvage Committee and other groups, will be to get all available salvage from apartments, office buildings and similar sources which, in many instances, could not be legally moved before because of ownership restrictions. It will involve securing the cooperation of owners and managers throughout the Nation.

Mullenix said that the association contemplates the salvage yield from these new sources will be heavy because it is believed that much heavy scrap, such as old boilers, radiators and plumbing fixtures, will now become available. All members are being enlisted for the drive, which is to be called the National Real Estate Scrap Drive. Tenants will be urged to clean out lockers, storerooms and their own quarters and land owners will be urged to donate vacant land for salvage depots.

With Realtors' Bowling League

Realty circles last week heard with regret news of the death of Lindsay Siegfried, Arlington County real estate man. Before entering business for himself Mr. Siegfried was associated with other neighboring Virginia offices. He was junior member of the Alexandria-Arlington-Fairfax Real Estate Board.

The team from J. Garrett Beitzell's office set a record of 1755 last week in winning three games from Lawyers Title Co., with Joe Pricel rolling a 415 high set. Weaver Bros. beat the L. R. Turner team three games and District Title Co. defeated Hohenstein Bros. in a like number. Shannon & Luchs remains in last place by losing the odd game to Hagner Co., reinforced by signing George Linkins, a former District League bowler.

Standing of Teams	W	L

Hagner Co.	12	16

Standing of teams in the District of Columbia Building and Loan Bowling League follows:

Washington Permanent	23	10	16,309
Perpetual No. 1	23	11	17,323
American	18	15	17,433

National Permanent	15	18	14,933
Perpetual No. 2	14	19	16,529
Oriental	10	23	14,580

The league has just completed its first round and with two more to go, a great change is expected in final standings. However, Washington Permanenf has a mere one game advantage over Perpetual No. 1 which was removed from first place last week by Perpetual No. 2 team taking the odd game after losing the opener in a play-off.

"Jenks" Brown of Perpetual No. 1 and Martin McCarthy of American are still competing for individual honors as they have in past years. McCarthy rolled high game last week with a score of 150.

FHA Mobilizes Great Private Fund

$180,000,000 on 40,000 existing home properties have been insured since January 1.

In addition, loans of approximately $140,000,000 financing essential repairs and maintenance, and remodeling to provide additional quarters for war workers in the designated war industry areas, have been insured thus far this year under the FHA's Title I repair loan program.

"By protecting lenders against loss of their investment, the FHA program of loan insurance has provided an effective medium through which banks, insurance companies, savings and loan associations, and other custodians of private funds have been able to finance projects essential to the Nation's wartime activities without sacrificing the safety of their investments," Ferguson declared.

"At the same time, by limiting the maximum interest charges on FHA-insured loans and by providing for monthly repayment of all insured obligations, the FHA program has made sound financing available to home buyers or to operators of rental housing projects for war workers on the most reasonable terms in history," he said.

Activities Specialized

Under wartime conditions, he explained, activities of the FHA are concentrated on the following principal programs:

1. Insurance of war housing loans under Title VI of the National Housing Act. Such loans are confined to projects in the designated critical housing areas which are clearly essential to meet the needs of war workers and which comply with all war housing requirements of the National Housing Agency and the War Production Board.

2. Insurance of Title I loans which finance essential repairs and maintenance necessary to keep existing dwellings in sound working order.

3. Insurance of Title I loans in the designated areas which provide additional living quarters for war workers through the remodeling or conversion of existing structures.

4. Insurance of home mortgage loans on existing dwellings under Title II. Such loans enable home owners to finance their mortgage obligations on a sound, debt-reducing basis and facilitate the transfer of existing houses.

Polluted Water Recognized As Carrier of Polio Germs

While it was formerly believed that infantile paralysis is a respiratory disease spread by droplets from the noses of the sick, latest research has disclosed that it can be spread by polluted drinking water, says the Plumbing and Heating Industries Bureau.

This fact, the Bureau points out, emphasizes anew the importance of good plumbing as a protection to health.

In an article, "New Knowledge About Polio" in Hygeia, a publication of the American Medical Association, the public is given the encouraging news that, even in the midst of war, "infantile paralysis is giving ground under concerted attack of science."

It is pointed out in the article that the latest discovery in connection with infantile paralysis is that it can be sewage-borne. The author of the article says that the virus of infantile paralysis is so potent that it will survive in sewage despite soapy water, acids, and chemicals.

This fact points to the importance of preventing the pollution of drinking water supplies by sewage. Such pollution may occur as a result of cross-connections in plumbing systems or from improperly constructed septic tanks.

It is for this reason that health authorities unanimously favor the strict regulation of all plumbing work, both urban and rural, by plumbing codes which set up standards of competency for those seeking to do plumbing work.

Wall Decorating

There are lots of decorating possibilities for a room with plain walls. Shabby chests of drawers can be covered with quilted chintz (tacked and glued).

Fuel Water Tanks Should Be Insulated

An economical way to conserve fuel and increase the efficiency of hot-water tanks is to cover them with an insulating jacket, says the Plumbing and Heating Industries Bureau.

A new jacket comes in standard sizes and can be quickly fitted on 30- and 40-gallon hot-water tanks to provide quicker heating and longer heat retention.

Anderson, Davis & Platt, Inc. Establishes Local Agency

Large space advertisements appearing in Washington newspapers announce establishment of the Washington advertising agency of Anderson, Davis & Platt, Inc., to fill the need for a specialized service for national advertisers in Washington.

The principal office of the agency remains in New York, but the Washington local agency is fully staffed to handle all forms of advertising or public relations for clients whose products, or whose institutional stories, need special representation in Washington.

T. Hart Anderson, jr., president of the agency, who divides his time between the two offices, explained this new development as follows:

"For over a year certain problems of our clients have made it necessary to us to be frequently in Washington and to develop special facilities and contacts there. Several months ago this necessitated opening a Washington office, staffed partly with Washington people and partly from New York.

"Our experience during this period has shown the need for a complete advertising and public relations organization in Washington to render special service to companies whose selling problem is now largely centered there or whose economic future may depend on decisions now being made there.

"The principle involved is not much different from that in which a firm seeking to do business in Great Britain usually sought the services of an agency familiar with selling and advertising in that country. The matter of putting your best foot forward in Washington today is even more vital and equally specialized.

"The Washington agency is competently staffed with people who know the Washington scene. It will serve a special group of clients whose interests can be furthered by advertising or public relations in Washington. It will not engage in any form of lobbying activities."

Pontiac's Gas Saving Rules

With Nation-wide gasoline rationing about to become effective, Pontiac Motor Division engineers offer a recapitulation of gasoline saving rules confirmed by millions of miles of test driving under all conditions.

Gasoline saving can only be obtained by careful driving in a well-conditioned car, Pontiac points out. The rules, therefore, are divided into two sections. How do you and your car stack up?

The Automobile

1. Keep engine in A-1 condition. It is surprising what a difference a valve grind, clean sparkplugs, correct timing and a clean combustion chamber will make in your economy.

2. Don't let tire pressure drop below recommended pressure. Soft tires not only rob you of gasoline but also wear out faster. Keep them up to recommended pressure by checking with a tire guage every few days.

3. Maintain correct toe-in. Too much or too little toe-in of front wheels causes scrubbing instead of rolling, eats up extra fuel and scrubs precious rubber off your tires. Have front wheels examined by an expert occasionally and adjusted when necessary.

4. See that brakes do not drag. Use lightest recommended oils—summer and winter. Dragging brakes and thick oil are arch enemies of gasoline economy. Particularly in winter and to a lesser extent in summer, thick oil causes extra friction. Your dealer or service station is the logical place to have your automobile serviced. Trained service attendants can tell you when your car needs adjusting in line with the above suggestions.

The Driver

5. Push out clutch and don't race engine when starting. No matter what kind of oil you have in the transmission, your engine will start easier and take less fuel in starting if you depress the clutch pedal. Incidentally, this practice will make your battery last longer. Racing the engine not only pumps extra raw gasoline into the engine but tends to wash lubricating oil off the cylinder walls causing undue wear on cylinders, pistons and piston rings.

6. Get into high gear at about 15 miles per hour. Some drivers accelerate in low and second gears up to the road speed desired before shifting into high. This practice is wasteful of fuel. Better economy will result from shifting into high around 15 miles per hour.

7. Use low and second gears less. Actual economy in low drops to between 2½ and 9 miles per gallon. In second it tests from 3½ to 15 miles per gallon; the lower figure in both cases corresponds to wide open throttle position of accelerator pedal. Minimum use of these gears will promote better economy.

8. Anticipate stops and coast more. Use brakes less. It takes energy to bring your automobile up to speed. Every time the brakes are applied a portion of that energy is lost in heat. Hence, coast to a stop wherever possible and use brakes less.

9. Coast in neutral whenever it is possible and safe. It is illegal to coast down grade in neutral in some States. However, wherever it is practicable and safe on gentle grades, shift to neutral and coast with throttle closed. This practice observed will stretch your operating radius importantly.

10. Don't increase speed on a grade. It takes less fuel to climb a grade at a uniform speed than to increase your speed while climbing. It takes extra fuel to accelerate and this fuel is lost so far as economy is concerned.

11. Use accelerator pedal gently. Trying to beat the other fellow at traffic lights is exceedingly wasteful of gasoline. Keep up with traffic but use accelerator pedal gently. Never push accelerator pedal down to floor except in an emergency. Gentle starts and gentle stops will also conserve your tires.

12. Select routes which have least stops. It seems a small thing but every time you have to bring your car up to speed it requires extra fuel. Braking for a stop uses up part of the energy built up in the car, wasting it in friction and heat. Select routes which have the least stops.

13. Drive at uniform speed. 25-30 miles per hour for maximum economy. Light cars driven at uniform speed of 25-30 miles per hour show economy of 20 miles per gallon or better. Starts, stops, acceleration, hills, braking and high wind combine to reduce this maximum. Hence the greater distance driven at these ideal speeds, the greater the net economy.

Brilliant Screens Liven Any Room

If a home is drab, brilliantly colored screens can liven a room. Unusual shades, keenly selected, will give a room an unique and artistic air. Hinged screens of colorkote board can be easily made by a novice decorator. The board should be painted with casein paint.

A careful eye for color made this three-tone screen — wistaria, magenta and gray—to set off a room which was predominantly black and white. A screen can be the center of interest of a room; the basis of the entire color scheme.

Yellow Traps Catch 50% More Beetles

Preference of Japanese beetles for beetle traps painted yellow instead of the green formerly used has been estimated to result in the capture of 50 per cent more beetles.

Flies don't like blue, which is a good reason for painting kitchens and other rooms in fly-infested houses in the azure color. Ants are believed to prefer red, which may be a tip for any inventor of ant traps.

Paint Makers Adopt War Substitutes

Col. George S. Brady, chief of materials statistics and reports division, Board of Economic Warfare, in a survey of imported materials in the paint industry, transmitted on the "convention-at-home" program of the National Paint, Varnish and Lacquer Association, complimented the paint industry upon its resourcefulness in continuing to produce high quality paint products to protect the vast equipmnet of the armed forces and other Government agencies directly engaged in the war effort, while safeguarding the Nation's homes and other properties from rot, rust and decay.

In citing substitution of domestic materials for imported ones in paint manufacture, Colonel Brady expressed the opinion that in some instances the wartime replacements have fundamentally improved the durability and working qualities of the paint. He also foresaw further improvement from the stimulation of manufacturing resourcefulness in wartime.

Colonel Brady said in part:

"There are many items that have been manufactured at the expense of imported raw materials that I personally would agree could be eliminated during the war, but paint and other protective coatings are not among them. I believe that you do not have to sell the idea that finishes are not merely ornamental. If you can double or treble the life of a product by protecting it with a paint or lacquer, thne you have really given us the equivalent of two ore three such products. It takes more than 1000 gallons of paint to finish even a small boat, and every ship captain knows that his paint can is one of his most valuable tools. There are innumerable pieces of Army field equipmnet that would have very short life in the rain and mud if they were not protected by good finishes.

"As for civilian goods, I believe that it is now more necessary than ever to put adequate protective paint coatings on everything. Whatever is worthy of manufacture during this emergency is certainly worthy of the additional expenditure of materials and labor for finishing to protect its life and usefulness. In homes, offices, hospitals and factories paints have also become a necessity for health protection, as unpainted or poorly finished rooms, furniture and equipment lead to uncleanliness and unsanitary conditions, not to mention the moral factor.

"This latter is so important by itself that General Marshall is quoted as justifying an extra expenditure of 15 million dollars on paint for barracks by saying that it would be bad for the morale of the men to coop them up in buildings that looked like lumber yards. Therefore, it would seem to me that the gauge on the limit of supplies of imported raw materials for the paint industry should be measured by the limits of the manufacture of goods that need paint coatings for their protection, with due regard, of course, to your ability to develop and use substitute materials."

In referring to the success of the paint industry in utilizing the best in pigments, in wartime, Colonel Brady commented:

"I never could see why it was necessary to ask that valuable shipping space be used in wartime to bring red iron oxide 10,000 miles from Ormuz when with a little extra effort we could use the oxides of New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

"The development of production of domestic titanium oxide was a case of a well-planned job. The company involved gave positive information well in advance as to what it could produce in a given time, so that it was possible to have several months' advance notice to cut down the imports, which had to be brought more than 10,000 miles.

"Another case which I will give as typical of a good job to fit into the war effort is that of the direct use of a domestic zinc ore in place of standard leaded zinc. This ore was not being used for other purposes and was brought into emergency paint use to save our strategic zinc even though it gave off-color in the paints. In fact, it was found that because it contained no soluble zinc it gave greater durability in the paints, and that for most purposes the off-color white would not be objectionable.

"Perhaps another example of individual jobs well done will illustrate how this industry has and can go forward in maintaining the supply of raw materials. The example I refer to is that of aluminum and bronze paint pigments. Aluminum flake and bronze flake had to be allocated early because of dependence on imported bauxite and copper ores.

"Normally, when an extender is used to conserve the original pigment there is a considerable reduction in quality of the paints. But it was found that with a large proportion of sericite mica flake the body and flow of the aluminum and bronze paints were improved and the change in color was not objectionable for most uses and was improved for some purposes. The production of mica flake was easily doubled and trebled in the Carolinas, as it was plentiful and not a strategic material."

Executrix Dies Before Testator

The will of Frank M. Hoadley, of Chevy Chase, admitted to probate in Orphans Court, Rockville, seems legal in every respect, except that the executrix, Mrs. Nellie T. Hoadley, to whom the bulk of the estate was left, died a week before her husband.

Frank T. Hoadley, son of the testator, was left $500, and Mr. Hoadley's mother was provided for in a life insurance policy, the instrument explains. The rest of the estate, whose value was not stated in the will, was left to Mrs. Hoadley. It was executed July 19, 1929.

Rev. Clarence Weedon, Retired Chaplain Dies

New York, Nov. 21 (AP).—The Rev. Clarence Dexter Weedon, 69, who retired this year as chaplain of the Convent of St. Anne, a Protestant Episcopal institution at Kingston, N. Y., died yesterday at St. Luke's Hospital. He had been living at Stamford, Conn.

Ordained in 1899, the Rev. Mr. Weedon was appointed minister of Trinity Protestant Episcopal Church at Clayton, Del., and became rector of that church a year later. He also served as vicar of St. Agnes Chapel at Washington. After several other charges he became chaplain of the Convent of St. Anne in 1933.

Outerwall Sheathing Aids Winter Comfort

Since homes will maintain lower temperatures this winter, families who have insulation applied as sheathing on outer walls of their houses are fortunate. Since it is the nature of heat to rise, the air at the floor line of the uninsulated house is always several degrees cooler than 5 feet above.

Insulation applied as sheathing on outer walls, point out technicians, helps maintain a more uniform temperature in the room.

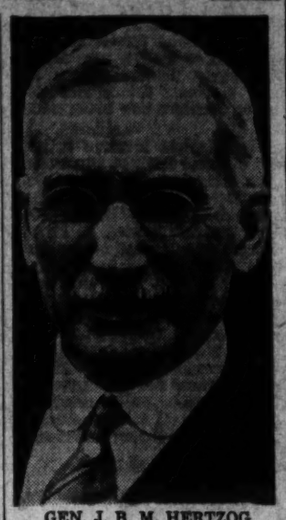
Rival of Smuts

Hertzog Dies; Boer Called War 'Crime'



GEN. J. B. M. HERTZOG

By the Associated Press

Capetown, Nov. 21.—Gen. J. B. M. Hertzog, former Prime Minister of the Union of South Africa, who lost office when he denounced Great Britain's war on Germany as a "crime" and tried to keep his country neutral, died today and thus was ended a famous feud with Jan Christiaan Smuts, present Prime Minister.

Hertzog, 76, died at the home of his son in Pretoria. He had entered a hospital two months ago for an abdominal operation.

When Hertzog's government fell as Parliament refused to follow his lead and severed relations with Germany at the outset of the war, he ended a 16-year term, believed to be a record for a British dominion statesman. The opposition was led by Smuts, who formed a new cabinet and South Africa soon after declared war.

Hertzog, like Smuts, had fought against the British in the Boer War. He began his long term in office as a successor to Smuts, who was South African Prime Minister during the First World War.

Early in 1940, Hertzog declared in parliament that the time had come to end the war with Germany. He scoffed at the suggestion that Hitler aimed at world domination, and said Britain's war on Germany was "nothing else than crime by international murder and robbery."

The doughty Smuts retorted:

"That sounds like a chapter from 'Mein Kampf'."

Hertzog resigned from parliament shortly afterward and retired to private life.

Despite their long political enmity, Hertzog included Smuts in a coalition government which he headed in 1933, and fought for a fusion of the country's two leading parties.

Hertzog was born April 3, 1866, at Wellington, Cape Colony. He started his career as a lawyer and was a judge when the Boer war began.

Mrs. Berliner Dies; Widow Of Inventor

Mrs. Cora Adler Berliner, lifelong resident of Washington and widow of the celebrated inventor, Emile Berliner, died yesterday at her residence, the Wardman Park Hotel, following a brief illness. She would have celebrated her eighty-first birthday on New Year's Day.

The daughter of the late Henry Adler and Anna Stern Adler, Mrs. Berliner married the late inventor in 1881 and was known to her associates for the many years of work she spent in behalf of the blind and as a member since its founding of the National Woman's Party. In more recent years, however, declining health forced her to forgo many of her usual activities.

Her husband, who died in 1929, the year he and his wife took up residence at the Wardman Park, was renowned as the inventor of the telephone transmitter, which helped commercialize the telephone and later became the core of radio broadcasting, and of the disc-record talking machine hailed the world over as the gramophone. He dabbled, also, with a helicopter before the Wright Brothers began their experiments at Kitty Hawk, and was instrumental in establishing standards of milk purity after his investigations into the then high death rate among babies led him to raw milk.

Mrs. Berliner is survived by two daughters, Mrs. Carl Greenbaum of New York City and Mrs. Milton W. King of Washington, and three sons, Col. Henry A. Berliner, overseas with the Army Air Forces; Herbert Berliner of Montreal, Canada, and Edgar M. Berliner of Beverly Hills, Calif.

Funeral services will be held tomorrow at 2 p. m. at the Danzansky funeral home, 3501 Fourteenth Street Northwest. Burial will be private.

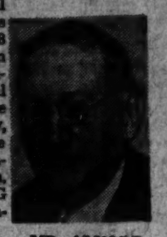
Alvord Dies; Funeral to Be Tomorrow

Elias Chapman Alvord, 82, a member of the bar of the District of Columbia for more than 20 years, died yesterday after an illness of several months at his home, 3928 Huntington Street Northwest. Funeral services will be held tomorrow, at 3 p. m., at the First Congregational Church, Tenth and G Streets Northwest.



MR. ALVORD

A native of Pennsylvania, Mr. Alvord received his education in his home State. He practiced law in Dakota, then a Territory, and later moved to Washburn, Wis., where he served several terms as district attorney. Mr. Alvord came to Washington in 1918 as assistant counsel of the Fuel Administration. In 1921 he received an appointment as trial attorney and examiner of the Federal Trade Commission. He resigned his Government position in 1932 when he opened a law firm with his son.

Mr. Alvord was a member of the Masonic and Knights of Pythias Orders, and he belonged to the First Congregational Church.

He is survived by Mrs. Miriam M. Alvord, his wife; his son, Ellsworth C. Alvord, and two daughters Mrs. M. E. Koehler and Miss Carrie Alvord, all of Washington.

Mrs. C. B. Kennedy, Business Agent for Bookbinders, Dies

Mrs. Cora B. Kennedy, 76, business agent for the last 10 years of Local 42, International Brotherhood of Bookbinders, died yesterday in Emergency Hospital following a brief illness.

Mrs. Kennedy was a native of Washington and had resided here all her life. Her residence was at 1317 Columbia Road Northwest.

She was twice married. Her first husband, George R. Belew, died about 40 years ago, and her second husband, Frank A. Kennedy, a World War veteran, died in 1940.

New York, Nov. 21.

The head of one of the war-agencies decided to postpone sending his request for a deficiency appropriation, until the new Congress convenes. "We'll wait," he told his aides, "because hell hath no fury as a lame-duck scorned" . . . Doubleday, Doran's "War in Our Time, 1931-1942," is going into extra editions . . . Bagdad, Florida, and Bagdad, Kentucky, both are bidding for the premiere of the movie, "Arabian Knights." Neither will get it, because the cast hired for that movie is larger than the population of either town . . . Ira Gershwin read the movie script of "The Life of George Gershwin," and had but one criticism: "Don't you think there's too much about me in it?"

Charles E. Wilson, the head of General Electric who recently became vice chairman of the War Production Board, was dining in a home near the White House. He looked out the window and stared at the Executive Mansion. "When I first went in there to talk it over," said Wilson, "I had 42 reasons why I wouldn't take a job in Washington. And now, here I am . . ."

A noted surrealist painter recently was arrested on suspicion of being a dangerous enemy alien. The Government officials questioned the painter's valet, who had no high esteem for his employer . . . "Do you think he's been trafficking with the enemy?" an official asked the valet . . . "Well, I don't know," he replied, pointing to the surrealist paintings on the wall, "but all those things around here look to me like code-signals."

In his new movie about the British navy, Noel Coward included an incident which occurred while he was discussing with a veteran officer some details of the naval battle at Crete . . . The officer described the sea off Crete and how the ships looked while heading for the engagement. "It reminded me of a scene on an old calendar-painting I once owned," said the officer . . . "In that painting," asked Coward, "were there 12 Nazi Dornier bombers in the sky?" . . . "No," said the officer . . . "Then," said Coward, "that's where art parts company with reality."

Hal Collins is a young gag-writer who recently was signed by Al Jolson to write the latter's radio shows. At the same time, he was ordered by his draft board to report for a physical examination . . . Before Collins was rejected because of his condition, he was placed at the head of a line of men—all nude—to be examined by the psychiatrist. Collins entered the office, and was asked about his profession. "I'm a gag writer," he said . . . The psychiatrist questioned him about this. "I make up funny things," said Collins . . . "Make one up right now," said the psychiatrist. "Okay," said Collins. He opened the door, waved away the long line of nude inductees and shouted: "That's all, fellers. The job's taken."

Abe Feder is the well-known Broadway lighting expert, who first won his reputation by lighting WPA shows, then lit Kaufman & Hart's "I'd Rather Be Right" and finally did the lighting for St. Patrick's Cathedral . . . Feder recently joined the Army. He was given a leave, but returned too late and went into the guardhouse. A sergeant interrogated him there: "Are you the famous lighting expert?" Feder nodded—and followed the sergeant to the commandant's office. There he again was asked: "Are you the famous lighting man?" He said "Yes sir"—and was given a gross of 10-watt bulbs to place in the sockets of the mess hall.

Edwin James Smythe, one of the 28 men indicted by the Washington Grand Jury, planted much of his propaganda in the Letters to the Editor columns of the newspapers. This habit led to his apprehension, after he was hunted by the FBI . . . Smythe found a good hiding place, but then felt the urge. He wrote a letter to an editor, suggesting that he send a white Protestant reporter to obtain the interview. That letter, bearing his address, led to his whereabouts being discovered.

Joe E. Lewis, the inveterate horse-player, was invited to the home of a noted producer, for some betting. When Lewis arrived, he found the scratch sheets all prepared. On another table were placed piles of books, magazines and newspapers about racing. And near the producer's were two girls, who kept evading his reach . . . The two men proceeded to bet, with Lewis following the producer's advice. They lost the first three races. The girls still were evading the producer's reach . . . Lewis took his advice on the next three races, and again lost. He turned to the producer, who still was trying to catch the girls: "The trouble with you," sighed Joe, "is that your horses run too slow, and your girls too fast."

Hedda Hopper's Hollywood

Hollywood, Nov. 22.

Orson Welles hit the top with the extras the first day of shooting on "Citizen Kane." He changed the word "extras" to "talent players" and they were very grateful. Some of them are quite snooty and well aware of their importance in picture making.

Don't let anybody kid you about the movies doing without extras. They're cutting down, but only because they have to. They might just as well shoot a picture without putting film in the camera. You might argue that if a legitimate production can be successful without them, why not a picture? Ah, but that's where the rub comes, my friends.

Motion pictures are much more elastic than the stage, and what a Broadway producer leaves to the imagination the Hollywood producer puts in. He leaves nothing to the imagination; 'cause why? An audience might begin to think—then where would he be? Sure, we've had battles royal between the better directors, who want to leave some things to the imagination of the beholder, and the producer, who doesn't—but that's another story.

When a director wants to depict pathos on the screen he'll create a scene like that in "The Pride of the Yankees" in which Teresa Wright, as Mrs. Lou Gehrig, is seen in the bleachers minus all extras. That's a scene that I'll be willing to bet will remain in your memory.

Movies Need Extras

On the stage "My Sister Eileen" wowed them for a couple of years. But the picture version expanded every incident that was merely referred to behind the footlights. On the stage the famous conga took place with half a dozen Portuguese seamen. On the screen the camera followed the conga from the basement studio to Greenwich Village, where it grew in proportion to the population. All those people who joined the conga line were extras and were an integral part of one of the most amusing scenes in the picture. But even if they'd had the money they couldn't have done that on the stage.

Did you ever see a big musical without a dance sequence? In "Holiday Inn," "Panama Hattie," "You Were Never Lovelier," and many more, what created the festive spirit? You guessed it—the "talent players."

They aren't just automatons or puppets that move around as though guided by strings or moving on a treadmill. They are "living backgrounds." Directors Mitch Leisen and Preston Sturges insist that as much care be given to selecting extras and bit players as to choosing stars. A star has an entire picture in which to establish his character; an extra does it as quickly as a finger is snapped.

If extras distract attention from the foreground action they've failed in their job. Imagine two stars talking on a busy street without any people moving behind them! Yet you as a theatergoer must not notice them. You're just aware that they're there. Extras who resort to tricks to make themselves noticed, or who "mug," are as glaringly bad in their jobs as is an artist who mixes his paints atrociously.

Way Up Is Hard

The mob that broke into the courthouse for "The Talk of the Town" comprised more than 200 extras who got a few days' work parading around like a bunch of hoodlums.

Working in the extra ranks many times leads to better things. A director will spot a comer and give him or her a few lines of dialog. That little break might lead to a term contract, and that stock ticket might lead to stardom. It's happened, and some of our biggest stars used to call Central Casting every night in the hope that the next day would find them working in the background of any picture.

Joel McCrea was an extra all through his high school years at Hollywood High. He used to double in horse-riding stunts for heroes and heroines. Those of us who know Joel well realize he's plenty smart. He merely put his brains to work to get out of the ranks. You see, kiddies, today success isn't handed to you on a golden platter. You've got to work for it.

Who but Red Skelton could dunk a doughnut and hit the top? Well, he "dood" it—in "Having a Wonderful Time"—but it wasn't as easy as it sounds. Nothing happened after he made the picture. He left for an eight-week run at the Paramount theater in New York. While he was away Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer got his test from R.-K.-O., liked it and signed him. When "Having a Wonderful Time" was first released there was nary a sign of billing for Red. But several months ago a rerun of the picture gave him top billing! O, well, that's Hollywood.

Lucille Makes It to Top

She's flown over South American jungles to shoot crocodiles from the sky; once she took an open-cockpit plane up in freezing weather to effect the rescue of a school boy; she once played a fast game of polo; has a hobby of wood carving; gained recognition as a mannequin in "Roberta," which got her a long-term contract. Give up? Lucille Ball! Needless to say, her flying days are over. The studio ordered her grounded. She's gone from R.-K.-O. to Metro—and the top rung of the ladder.

Claudette Colbert's chance meeting with Cecil B. De Mille while strolling across the Paramount lot started her off on the right foot.

"How," he asked, "would you like to play the wickedest woman in the world?"

That stopped her, and she managed to gulp, "Why, I'd love it!"

So right then and there she was cast as Cleopatra in "The Sign of the Cross." It was tough work. Through De Mille she learned what authenticity means. De Mille has many finds to his credit, and Claudette is one little gal who proved worthy of his faith.

Now, with the shortage of manpower, our producers had better look in their own backyards. There's plenty of potential star material in the ranks.

Movie Wives Insist on Following Their Husbands to Camp

Hollywood, Nov. 21.—Hollywood has a double major headache. The glamour girls—and in a number of cases actress-wives of the servicemen—are following the men right to the gates of the training camps and there is nothing that can be done about it.

Certainly it is a phase of the war that Hollywood didn't anticipate, but there is little the studios can do about it even if they want to. Our Hollywood soldiers are scattered all over the Nation.

Priscilla Lane suspended herself from Warner Brothers and there was nothing the film colony could do about it. She just said she didn't want to do any more pictures. She wanted to remain with her husband, Lieut. Joseph Howard, at Victorville. "I don't know when he might be sent overseas and I have no intention of letting anything interfere with my married happiness," she said.

When Madeleine Carroll said no more movies for her for the duration, few people took her seriously. Madeleine had had her best year at Paramount and this company had great plans for her. But Madeleine is in love with her young husband, Sterling Hayden. So when he joined the Merchant Marine she went to Bermuda with him. When he went overseas she returned to New York and went to work for Uncle Sam, and in a letter to me recently said frankly that she did not expect to face a camera for the duration.

Annabella, Tyrone Power's pretty blonde wife, turned down cold a long-term contract at Twentieth Century-Fox so she could follow her Ty to San Diego as soon as he finished "Crash Dive." She wants to be near him while he is going through training at the Marine Boot Camp. She has made one picture, "Secret Mission," and that is all she is willing to do while Ty is in the U. S. A.

Constance Bennett moved her children, to Florida, where Gilbert Roland is stationed. She refused several movie offers. "I don't know how long Gilbert will be in this country," she told me, "and I am going to be near him as long as I can.

Cobina Wright, jr., has practically given up her movie work to follow her husband from camp to camp. For six weeks she has lived in a two-room apartment near the Georgia camp where Palmer Beaudette is undergoing training as an officer.

Attractive Brenda Joyce dropped her career as soon as her young husband, Lieut. Owen Ward, entered the service. She promptly moved to a little place near the camp where he was stationed and lived in a small apartment, doing her own housework so she could be near him. She only returned to have her baby in a local hospital and, by her own admission, she has never been as happy in her entire life.

Brenda Marshall told Warner Brothers she simply had to have time off to see Bill Holden, and she's lost pounds since he joined Uncle Sam's Army, worrying about him and trying to arrange her schedule so she could spend time with him.

Ellen Drew bowed out of Paramount so she could be free to go to England, if the opportunity presented itself.

And many more of these same actresses are living in cramped, uncomfortable quarters, doing their own cleaning, proving that marriage is not held as lightly in Hollywood as some believe.

Morton Bowe and June Winters, two of the numerous principals in the Boston Comic Opera Company, in a week's repertoire of the Gilbert and Sullivan operettas, opening in the National Theater tomorrow night with "The Pirates of Penzance" as the inaugural bill. Florenz Ames and Robert Pitkin are among the veteran stars of the organization

SWING SESSIONS

By Bill Gottlieb

Been meaning for some time, now, to put in a good word for a character who's made a solid impression on Washington's "hep" citizenry. She is De Lloyd MacKaye, currently finishing up one of her periodic stints at Paul Young's Righteous Romany Room. (Also must tell you, sometime soon, about Young's brilliant trumpet-playing orchestra leader, Charlie Frankhauser.)

This gal MacKaye, if you haven't found out for yourself, is the biggest single piece of musical entertainment in any club in downtown Washington. Her forte, if it is any one thing, is the piano. Though she is often too concerned with pleasing the public with flashy versions of "Tiger Rag," et al., she can, when she has a mind to, play some very sound and sincere music. Be it ballads, jump tempos, boogie woogie or straight blues, Miss MacKaye generates more music in one bar than does another highly publicized musician in both her latest albums.

Like so many swing musicians today, De Lloyd started out strictly legit. She studied at the Christensen Conservatory in St. Louis and went to Illinois College to learn to be a music teacher. Showman Lew Leslie got wind of her, yanked her out of school and sent her to London with his "Blackbirds Of 1934." This particular "Blackbirds" edition featured Gershwin's "Rhapsody In Blue," and De Lloyd was the piano soloist. It all happened so suddenly that she actually made her first stage appearance in England rather than here.

De Lloyd has three other attributes that crowd behind her piano ability in photo-finish fashion. There is, for one thing, her personality—a downright lovable one coupled with fine stage presence. Then there's her unusual talent for whistling, with which she displays some of her most remarkable hot licks. And of course there's her singing. Speaking very roughly, I'd call her a husky version of Mildred Bailey. And she knows how to sell lyrics all the way from "Mr. Five by Five" to "My Yiddisha Mama."

Only catch to this big buildup is that last week she sang with too much enthusiasm at the Stage Door Canteen and contributed, in addition to customary services, one larynx, slightly used but very super when in working order. De Lloyd can still put over her songs but her sore throat has definitely slowed her down. Nor can she save her voice by putting all the emphasis on the keyboard. She is plagued with an undersized, out-of-tune piano—one of those "C'est le guerre" models.

JAM SESSION—Those of you who recall the tremendously successful jam session last year in the Press Club auditorium given by the Cooperative Book Shop should welcome the news that a flock of sharp New York cats are due back at the club a week from tomorrow night under the sponsorship of the same group. The tentative list of jazz men includes Teddy Wilson, Sidney Bechett, Sidney DeParis, Art Hodes, Zutie Singleton, Mezz Mezzirow, Pops Foster and Sandy Williams. More details on this next Sunday.

And I hope you caught the Howard Theater show last week to hear two of the few new exciting bands: Louis Jordan and Doc Wheeler.

RECORD BRIEFS—The record companies, still scrapping with Petrillo and the American Federation of Musicians, have not recorded a new side in a couple of months; but with shellac stocks being cut by WPB at regular intervals, Victor, Decca and Columbia don't seem to mind and are satisfied with filling back orders and repressing old hits—at least until January 1.

A few new sides, hurridly cut before the "ban," have reached this desk, others listed on the release sheets can be found by diligent searchers at a few shops around town. Most interesting item is one of Capt. Glenn Miller's parting shots, before joining the Army: "Sleepy Town Train" and "Juke Box Serenade." The "A" side is a shuffling, instrumental specialty with a relaxed beat and some nice Beneke tenor work. "B" is a bright thing with trick lyrics that plug Miller's and Victor's competitors—Kay Kyser, Harry James and Benny Goodman (all Columbia) and the Ink Spots (Victor).

Dinah Shore and Bing Crosby, tops on pops, do their usual competent work. It's Dinah on "Manhattan Serenade" and "You'd Be So Nice To Come Home To" and Bing on a quartet of sides from his latest movie, "Road To Morocco" and "Ain't Got A Dime To My Name." Tony Pastor has a version of "Hey, Mable" that he dishes out straight, without the usual horseplay given that song.

The Andrews Sisters and the Ink Spots continue to sound like the Andrews Sisters and the Ink Spots, the former on "Massachusetts" and "Here Comes The Navy" (sung to "Beer Barrel Polka,"; the latter on that oldie, "Street of Dreams" and on "Don't Get Around Much Anymore," a melodic bit by Duke Ellington. Barry Wood, our unofficial singer of patriotic songs, is on his usual kick with "Ev'rybody Ev'ry Payday" and "March for the New Infantry."

The Southern Sons and the Sons of the South (two different groups) both do inadequate jobs on "Lift Every Voice," the Negro "national anthem" written by J. W. and J. R. Johnson. The Southern Sons back this side with a slightly overdone job on "Praise the Lord and Pass the Ammunition."

On the warmer side, there's Charlie Barnet's "Victory Walk" and Mercer Ellington's' "Things Ain't What They Used To Be." Charlie's sax and somebody's trumpet take the honors. Louis Jordon and his superlative blues voice, blues alto and blues orchestra has a fling at "The Chicks I Pick Are Slender, Tender and Tall" and "What's the Use of Getting Sober." Sam Price, whose boogie woogie piano drives his band, has two specialties in "Teed Up" and "Frantic."

The Marshalls, on the new Hit Label, have a trio of hit tunes on their first try: "He's My Guy," "Amen," "I Met Her On Monday."

Hollywood Oddities

By Ted Gill

Hollywood, Nov. 21 (AP).—Beauty may never be rationed . . . along with rubber, sugar and other commodities . . . but hoarding of pretty chorus girls is one of filmland's not too unpleasant war wrinkles . . .

Fearing some voluptuous chorines may desert studios for matrimony or more hazardous war work, several flicker factories . . . to protect themselves against a possible shortage of pulchritude for future musical films . . . have started putting them under contract for the duration . . .

"Even without the war," summarized one leading dance director, "there would have been a heavy demand for, and a short supply of, chorus girls . . . musicals were due for an upswing in popularity in any case and, as a result, our chorus reserves were depleted . . . the girls got jobs in night clubs and stage revues, war industries, married or, just became too old for the work . . .

"The other day I stopped in a gasoline filling station . . . the two girl attendants had been in one of my choruses . . . they said they were doing better at the new job than they had been when they were dancing."

So, lo, the plight of the poor chorus girl brightens . . .

* * * *

Short Snort—Bing Crosby is quite a kidder . . . Recently they had an air raid drill at his studio, but the diminutive crooner couldn't work up much enthusiasm about it . . . Said he: "If we ever do have a real air raid, I'll stroll over next door to RKO and be safe . . . They haven't had a 'hit' there in three years" . . .

Silly Sally—Preston Struges, who invents numerous little gadgets while not writing and directing movies, comes up with a new contraption to protect traffic cops from sun and rain . . . It's a large umbrella with two red "stop" and two green "go" signs on its four huge stripes . . . Sturges thought so much of the idea he wrote in a special sequence in "The Miracle of Morgan's Greek" where William Demarest, playing a corner cop, directs traffic with a simple twist of the wrist . . . and keeps cool in the shade . . .

Orphaned Oddity—Gene Lockhart thinks this is where he came in . . . Before entering films in 1934, Lockhart appeared occasionally with the Metropolitan Opera Company as a comedian, expert at pantomime . . . as a result of that association, he recently accepted an offer to appear with the San Francisco Opera Company . . . Now, as a result of that recent engagement, the Metropolitan wants him back to New York next spring for the light opera season . . . Lockhart, who composes music as a hobby, says he'll accept, if his picture commitments then permit . . .

Daffy Dilly—Folks here are still chuckling over the actress who, tiring of being cast in scenes where she had to display her shapely legs all the time, decided she'd make a desperate effort to win a dramatic role . . . So she poured acid on her lower extremities, hoping to disfigure them . . . But the studio, discovering the plot immediately, rushed her to a hospital where a leg disfigurement was prevented . . . And she has yet to make her first appearance in a dramatic role . . .

Assorted Asides—So many film technicians have left for war work or the armed forces there now is talk that trained enlisted personnel may be used in the making of Government films formerly turned out by studio craftsmen . . . Because some American-made chinaware doesn't break realistically enough before sound microphones in domestic dish-throwing battles, movies generally have to use the thin imported kind, which makes such scenes pretty expensive, as well as messy . . .

Chitter Chatter—Jean Parker has found a new use for color photographs . . . For several years, she has been collecting them from her studio . . . For Christmas presents, she makes them into bright and attractive lamp shapes, with each print autographed by the stars . . . Character Actor Lynn Overman, who used to be a jockey before he became a minstrel trouper years ago, now is playing a minstrel in the movies again for the first time since then, in "Dixie."

Norman Abbott Took Hard Way

Hollywood, Nov. 21 (AP).—When things begin happening in Hollywood, everything happens at once.

Norman Abbott, nephew of Bud Abbott, had been around town for two and a half years and, regardless of the fact that his uncle is the shining light of Universal Studios, had gotten exactly nowhere until day before yesterday.

At that point, the boys on the lot gave Norman the job as standin for one of the actors in "Bad Company," a picture which stars the Dead End Kids. This was swell. It was money in the bank.

But things got sweller. For one of the bit players in the picture suddenly received a billet doux from this draft board. Then the actor portraying the second lead was also called. The brass hats looked around for someone to replace him and, logically enough, chose our hero. All this took place within a space of 24 hours.

Irony Note: As soon as he finishes the picture, Norman has a date with the Merchant Marine.

There Is One Of Everything

Hollywood, Nov. 21 (AP).—Meet Ben Turner, who kills flies:

Southern California, with its fabulous climate, is a paradise for flies. They thrive the year 'round.

They also ruin movie scenes. A love scene, for example, loses that indefinable something if in the midst of a healthy kiss a fly lands on Ann Sheridan's nose.

So Ben keeps guard. He's become quite expert with his spray gun.

"It's not sporting," says he, "to shoot a fly while he's sitting. We got a guild, we have. We give flies a chance. We nail 'em on the fly, so to speak. Ha! Ha!

Cary Grant Quits Playing School Bus

Hollywood, Nov. 21 (AP).—The Cary Grant Bus Service has gone out of business and Cary hopes that his passengers will understand.

Last week, while driving to the R.-K. O. studio from his San Fernando Valley home, Cary happened to take a route much frequented by school children. Standing on a corner waiting for a bus, was a little 9-year-old boy, with school books and lunch pail in his arms.

Cary stopped the car and asked the boy if he would like a lift. The kid answered, "Sure!" and jumped in. He began to talk of the man behind the wheel and then suddenly stopped. He had recognized the driver.

Evidently he told the story when he got to school, because the next morning he was on the corner with two of his buddies. Cary stopped the car again and the boys squeezed in.

The following morning the corner looked like a young football rally. The original patron was surrounded by a bunch of 9-year-olds who quite obviously didn't believe the story. But Cary managed to get seven of them in the car.

Boston Comic Opera Company Pays Capital Its Second Visit on Road to Permanency In Week of Repertoire at the National

By Nelson B. Bell

THE ORGANIZATION now known as the Boston Comic Opera Company, which tomorrow night will open a single week of repertoire in the National Theater, quite obviously is pursuing an ascending course in the fulfillment of its avowed determination to establish itself as this country's permanent exponent of the brittle satire and buoyant music of the Gilbert and Sullivan operettas.

The announcement of this intention last season was met with frank skepticism in many quarters. It seems, however, to have been something a little more substantial than a producer's dream and a resourceful press agent's catchline.

The producer who did the dreaming was R. H. Burnside, whose name is inseparably linked with the gargantuan musicals and majestic spectacles that brought international fame to the old New York Hippodrome, and with the other memorable theatrical offerings he sponsored in association with the late Charles Dillingham.

It is a complex and tedious undertaking to assemble a permanent company of such flexible talents as are required to meet the rigid demands of works so widely diversified as the Savoyard operas. Once assembled, those talents and temperaments must be welded into a perfectly dovetailed and coordinated whole that will function with the precision of a nicely adjusted piece of machinery. The task is no easier in the theater than the assemblage of a championship team in any other form of cooperative effort.

It eventuated, therefore, that a year ago last summer Mr. Burnside found himself engaged in an arduous and, at times, seemingly impossible enterprise. There was comparatively little talent available that could fulfill the unique requirements of both singing and acting Gilbert and Sullivan satisfactorily. And it was emphasized during the quest that perhaps never before in the history of the American theater have so few professional centers for the training of fine musical abilities existed as now.

Numerous Artists Assembled From Few Sources

BUT MR. BURNSIDE is a stout fellow. And he did secure his artists, although not always from expected sources. Florenz Ames, one of the mainstays of his troupe, he recruited from the musical comedy stage. Mr. Ames long had been the beneficiary of wide public acclaim in such frivolities as "Of Thee We Sing," "Let 'Em Eat Cake," "Strike Up the Band" and "I'd Rather Be Right." He also had achieved renown as an actor, without benefit of music, in such lively items as "First Lady," in which he was prominent in the support of Jane Cowl and Lily Cahill.

Morton Bowe, another of the featured players, is well known in the field of radio and has a considerable background on the stage in addition. Margaret Roy, after studying music in New York, became a spotlighted singer at the Radio City Music Hall and has appeared in concert in many principal cities. Her appearance last season with the Boston Comic Opera Company—known then as the Gilbert and Sullivan Opera Company—was her first in the legitimate theater and established her as actress as well as vocalist. Marjorie Hayward is a graduate of the Juillard School of Music, with thorough training on the musical stage. Robert Pitkin is one of the native veterans in everything that is musical and comic.

In fact, if one were to check the records, it might be found that the famous D'Oyly Carte Company, when it first was launched in England, could muster fewer members with actual background in the art of the musical theater than the current company which aspires to become its counterpart in America.

Ignoring for the moment the exigencies of these troubled times, the prospect of permanency for the Boston group seems exceedingly bright—a suggestion that is eloquently borne out by the eagerness with which Washington has availed itself of the advance ticket sale for the present engagement.

Works 'Underground' Only in Place of Origin

WITH GILBERT AND SULLIVAN indulging such an uninhibited exercise of their right to the freedom of speech, by poking keen-edged satire at everybody and everything they deemed in need of correction, it is one of the oddest paradoxes of the theater that the foundations of their greatness should have been laid, in a strictly literal sense, "underground."

"Savoy Opera" has been a familiar descriptive of their works now for something more than half a century, so it is not surprising that so few, even among the hoariest of the Gilbert and Sullivan admirers still living, should ever have heard of the long-vanished theater in which the first four of the immortal series were originally produced. Its existence seems to be looked upon as a sort of prehistoric myth.

Documentary evidence is extant, nevertheless, to indicate that it was actually underground that W. S. Gilbert and Arthur Sullivan well and truly laid the foundations of the perennial triumph of their artistic partnership. For the old Opera Comique, to which "The Sorcerer," "H. M. S. Pinafore," "The Pirates of Penzance" and "Patience," in brilliant sequence, first drew London Town, was almost completely a subterranean theater, with only its uppermost circle on the level of the street.

Its auditorium was approached from a narrow entrance on the north side of the Strand, almost directly opposite Somerset House, by traversing a formidable length of winding and constantly descending passages, which, with their vivid plush hangings and gaudily gilt mirrors, gave one the odd impression of having wandered into a kind of highly magnified and elaborately decorated rabbit warren.

It was here, on a winter evening in the late 70's, that the miraculously matched librettist and composer—who had already given elsewhere an appetizing foretaste of their joint quality in the sparkling and still popular trifle, "Trial by Jury"—brought their dual fame to its birth in the production, by "The Comedy Opera Company, Limited, Under the Management of Mr. R. D'Oyly Carte," of their first two-act comic opera, "The Sorcerer."

Even at this distance of time it is easy to surmise with what delight the irresistibly droll mock necromancy and teapot incantations of the frock-coated and bewhiskered John Wellington Wells, the "family sorcerer," was greeted—especially when played by the then "Mr. George Grossmith, jun.—his first appearance on the stage."

This was in 1877. "The Sorcerer" was a pronounced success and enjoyed 175 performances. Quite a run for its day.

Original and Later Favorites in Repertory

THE VOGUE of the Gilbert and Sullivan operettas really started with the furore that greeted the initial performance of "H. M. S. Pinafore," on March 25, 1878.

Its triumph was so complete and its run so prolonged, 700 performances, that the author and composer, on the crest of the wave, seemed to have a precarious task ahead of them to provide a successor. But in due course they "turned the trick again" with the whimsically "Gilbertian" and musically delightful "Pirates of Penzance," which was presented 363 times, beginning April 3, 1880.

Then, on April 23, 1881, came the utterly disarming "Patience, or Bunthorne's Bride," last of the operas to be produced on the old stage. Activities soon were transferred to the newly built Savoy, on the other side of the Strand. The move was in all respects a well-approved one. But it left the veteran patrons who had been faithful from the beginning with ineradicable memories of the ramshackle underground theater in which the deathless operettas had been born.

These, then, are the musical gems the Boston Comic Opera Co., with its repertory considerably expanded, and certainly perfected, since last year, will be presenting in the National this week. Not only does the list embrace "Pirates of Penzance," "Pinafore" and "Patience" from the days of the Opera Comique, but "Trial by Jury," "The Mikado," "The Gondoliers" and "Iolanthe" as well. The roster is so ample that only on Saturday will earlier bills be repeated.

Old friends, after all, are best.

·Theaters·

Alexis Smith and Errol Flynn, as the chief "heart interest" and the titular figure, respectively, in the Warner Brothers production of "Gentleman Jim," based on the life of the late James J. Corbett, scheduled to follow the current "My Sister Eileen" on the screen at the Earle Theater

Ann Miller and Johnny Johnston, featured members of a cast that also includes Betty Rhodes, Jerry Colonna, Vera Vague, Harry Barris, Eddie Quillan and others of note, in Paramount's "Priorities on Parade," now at the Metropolitan

Ray Milland and Ginger Rogers, in the costellar roles of the Paramount comedy, "The Major and the Minor," on the books as the next attraction at Loew's Palace Theater, following the current run of "For Me and My Gal." Rita Johnson and Robert Benchley are importantly cast in this story

Evelyn Williams, Constance Cummings and John Clements, the three stellar players in "Shadows on Beacon Hill," the eavalcade of English history now being presented for the first time on a Washington screen, as chief feature for the week at the Little Theater.

Miss Cornell Brings Brilliant Cast to National

Recognizing the rich opportunities for actors in the portrait gallery of Chekhov's famous comedy, "The Three Sisters," Katharine Cornell has cast her production of the play with such a generous, lavish array of star-gleaming players as will stir theater-goers at the mere sight of their names. Miss Cornell's associates on the stage of the National Theater the week of November 30 will be Judith Anderson, Edmund Gwenn, Ruth Gordon, Dennis King, Gertrude Musgrove, Alexander Knox, McKay Morris, Tom Powers and Eric Dressler.

The tribute of so extraordinary a company for one of the greatest of Russian plays is timely and reminds that "The Three Sisters" was the first piece which Anton Chekhov wrote for another group of actors who, as the Moscow Art Theater, gained through him an international reputation. Since the author died in 1904, no playwright has emerged in Russia with anything like his power in the delineation of the inner spirit of the people of that amazing country.

A Symposium of Personal Dramas

The characters of the comedy are mainly various types of middle-class provincial society in the period before the awakening of the revolutionary flame. Amid the humor and pathos of the circles of men and women surrounding three sisters, who cherish romantic dreams of going to Moscow, Chekhov conveys the individual dramas of each of their lives under the social and political conditions shaped by the repressive autocracy of the czarist rule. Noted for his gifts in creating an exciting sense of reality on the stage, he is so interested in his whole group that he handed rewarding parts to each actor.

The production was directed by Guthrie McClintic, who has staged all of Miss Cornell's successes. The settings were designed by the firm of Motley, formerly of England, which provided those for the actress last season in her mounting of "The Doctor's Dilemma." The version used by Mr. McClintic is his own, prepared with the counsel of Alexander Koiransky, once a well-known dramatic critic in Moscow.

Lou Costello and Bud Abbott, usually referred to the other way 'round, as stars of the Universal detective comedy, "Who Done It?" now on view as principal screen feature of the bill at RKO-Keith's Theater. The cast also includes Patric Knowles, William Gargan and Louise Allbritton

Preston Foster and Gene Tierney, chief figures of interest in the Twentieth Century-Fox production of "Thunder Birds," announced as the screen feature for the new week, beginning Thursday, at Loew's Capitol Theater. John Sutton, Jack Holt, Dame May Whitty, George Barbier, Richard Haydn and Reginald Denny are others in an exceptional cast

The New York Theaters

By Howard Barnes

New York, Nov. 21.

The Theater Guild has played both cozy and daring in launching its twenty-fourth subscription season. On the one hand it has presented a new comedy by Philadelphia Story Philip Barry, with no less than a drawing card than Katharine Hepburn in the leading role. On the other, it has presented a cock-eyed fantasy about a tired rural mailman who decides to emulate the arboreal world by becoming a sycamore. "Without Love," with its popular collaborators, should pay big dividends, although it is something less than a satisfying evening in the theater. "Mr. Sycamore" is not much of a bargain, anyway you look at it, but it is at least a try.

A producer could scarcely have asked for more talent in every branch of make-believe than the Guild has assembled for "Without Love." The same, Barry, who has a long list of whimsical romances to his credit has written this singular synthesis of proselyting and lovemaking. The same Miss Hepburn who has confounded both producers and critics in her stormy and successful career, is the pivotal character in the St. James Theater offering, while Elliott Nugent, who was so good in "The Male Animal," gives her staunch support as a pre-Pearl Harbor war-monger. Meanwhile Robert B. Sinclair, with some last minute touches by Arthur Hopkins, has staged the show with considerable acumen and Robert Edmond Jones has devised striking scenic backgrounds.

There is no doubt that Miss Hepburn will suffice to keep the inaugural Theater Guild offering running for a time. According to accredited tub-thumpers, the show is standing them up and has an advance sale which augurs exceedingly well for the entertainment. At the same time, I think "Without Love" should have been far more satisfying with its brilliant collaboration. It takes more than glamorous personality and bright chitchat to make a high and memorable adventure in playgoing. Barry and Hepburn have contributed little more than those evanescent qualities to the new production.

At its best, it leaves a lot to be desired. The farcical notion of having a grieving widow and a disillusioned career man try to work out a marriage without recourse to the fundamental strains and stresses of a normal human relationship might have been elaborated into a rather delightful escapist comedy. As it stands the St. James exhibit is little more than a demonstration that glib writing and acting can carry a show, so long as author and star are riding on the crest of a wave. The wave, obviously, is "The Philadelphia Story," which brought Miss Hepburn back from Hollywood to a triumphant stage engagement and then gave new impetus to her screen career.

Screaming Is Sara Swartz' Way of Acting in Pictures

Her name is Sara. She's a scream.

For $25 per scream, she'll squeeze shut her eyes, gulp in a breath, imagine whatever scene the script calls for—and flutter your eardrums with a blood-curdler.

She's done it in "Phantom of the Opera," "Dracula," "Man in the Iron Mask," all the Frankenstein chillers and innumerable others.

In 25 years she's been in practically every Universal picture in some capacity. She's also worked for other studios. And she usually screams. Her boast is she's been in more pictures than anyone else in Hollywood.

That's because in 1917 when she was a slim, attractive juvenile only a few years off a Denver stock stage she dashed into a flaming studio cutting room and rescued some valuable film.

It put her in the hospital for six months. Also, Carl Laemmle ruled her name should always be on the casting list.

But to get back to her screaming:

Sara was doing all sorts of work—extra bits, atmospheric roles and character oddments, when, during the early days of sound, Heroine Mae Clarke was to die screaming in "Waterloo Bridge."

To choke off a long story, Sara was dubbed in. Although no dub, she's been dubbing in most of the time since.

Sara's ambition—even after growing up with the movie business—is to get "a break." A decent part.

"And if I don't get one soon, why, I'll . . . I'll . . . I'll just scream."

Saturday Opera Broadcast To End Careful Preparation

By Ernest L. Schier

When an estimated ten million opera lovers tune in to the opening broadcast of the Metropolitan Opera next Saturday at 2 p. m., (WMAL-Blue) months of preparation by an army of artists will begin to bear fruit. The new broadcast season will be introduced by the voice of the popular Lily Pons, singing the title role of "Lucia di Lammermoor."

Painstaking preparation to meet broadcasting requirements will also go into making of a perfect performance. Circuit wires, amplifiers and tubes, inactive for the past eight months in the opera house, have been checked for proper action. Nine microphones placed about the auditorium and stage, 20 plug stations set in the footlights, backstage, and at various other posts, have been tested and replaced where necessary.

During the broadcast, three engineers will be stationed in the master control room of the network, one in a studio and two at the scene of the performance. Here the production men check with the stage manager on the timing of each act, following every cue and reporting to announcer Milton J. Cross in his broadcasting booth on one side of the grand tier.

This new broadcast series will be dedicated to the United Nations, and each program will pay tribute to one of the nations, with distinguished visitors from that country as guests of honor. The above-named Mr. Cross again will act as master of ceremonies for the various intermission features.

War Victory Party

One intermission period each week wil be known as the "Opera War Victory Party," at which time listeners will hear from prominent singers and leading nationals of our allies.

The "Opera Forum Quiz" will continue to function during the second intermission period, presenting the noted triumvirate of the musical world—Olin Downes, Robert Lawrence and Dr. Sigmund Spaeth.

A staff of script writers and production men already are at work preparing to handle the fan mail, which runs into the thousands every week, each letter requiring an answer.

When there is a third intermission, a new feature will be offered, to be called "The Metropolitan Opera Column of the Air," bringing the radio audience current news and anecdotes about the world of the opera.

The exigencies of war having brought to a sudden end the tradition of presenting new European artists, the American singer is at long last finding his place in the sun, and this, perhaps, is one of the most significant items of the forthcoming season.

It is fortunate for the Met that the opera-supporting public has for many years been increasingly eager to welcome native singers who possess the necessary ability. It is now up to the powers-that-be to hasten the discovery and development of American-born singers.

Radio Helps Opera

Radio already has been enlisted as a means of weeding out singers of the caliber and range required by opera. To this extent, the Metropolitan Auditions of the Air has been an active aid in filling the depleted ranks of Met singers. Three new winners were inducted for the season 1941-42, bringing the total from this source alone to 17.

Another new program is in the making which will also help to speed the development of young hopefuls. To be known as "Metropolitan Opera, U. S. A.," the new program will feature Lawrence Tibbett, great American baritone, as master of ceremonies. The purpose of the broadcast will be to afford young artists, whose voices have won them coveted contracts to sing with the Met this season, the opportunity of making themselves known to the public by singing leading arias over the half-hour show.

The first two artists to appear will be Astrid Varnay, a native of Stockholm, and Walter Cassel of Council Bluffs, Iowa. It was Miss Varnay who made the spectacular debut on December 12 of last year as Sieglinde, when illness prevented Lotte Lehmann from appearing in the Wagnerian role. Cassel arrived by the more-devious route of cattle man on a freight train after receiving encouragement from Tibbett when the latter was in Omaha doing a concert.

The consideration of whether the opera has any legitimate place in the American scene of today has been anticipated by General Manager Edward Johnson in the closing paragraph of his annual report on the Metropolitan Opera Association.

In discussing whether or not we are fiddling while Rome burns, Johnson says, "We may believe that this is a war of nerves and that to win the war physically the American people must gird themselves spiritually. We may hold the conviction that opera and all it stands for is a manifestation of the very things for which our country is fighting. It may be so.

"But these are no more than arguments and can prevail only so far as to determine us to keep the opera open for the public. Apparently . . . there is a widespread eagerness for the continuation of the Metropolitan Opera. If this is so, the 1942-43 season will be a success. Only the public itself can make it come true."

Ecuadorean Show Opens Wednesday

Exhibit Will Honor Visit of President Del Rio and Display Little-Known Art

By Ada Rainey

In honor of the visit of President Carlos Alberto Arroyo del Rio of Ecuador an exhibition of Ecuadorean art has been arranged at the Pan American Union which will be opened with a reception on Wednesday afternoon. This will be an important social as well as artistic event, and will stress the significant part that art plays in the diplomatic and cultural relations between the two republics. The high development of painting, sculpture and architecture in Ecuador is scarcely realized in our country except by the few enthusiasts who have made a special study of this aspect of its culture.

It is known, of course, that wood sculpture has attained high development in Spain, the mother of the civilization of most of our neighbors to the south, but that this art was also highly developed in South America is not so well understood. A Washington collector, however, was definitely aware of the beauty and importance of this phase of art and made a collection of wood sculpture. The late D. C. Stapleton collected examples of these sculptures and the figures are loaned in his memory. They constitute the largest collection of these sculptures in this country as only a few of this sort of wood carved figures are owned by even the large museums.

Varied Interest

The present group is of remarkable workmanship and intrinsic interest. The figures are of the Magi, saints and other subjects used in the adornment of the churches in Quito. These sculptures now on view are small in size and beautiful in the delicacy of the carving and the charm of their inspiration. They have a quality quite individual coming from the influences which filtered into Ecuador from Spain, Flanders and Italy.

Many artists and monks were sent to the New World who were highly trained and contributed to the glory of the architecture and sculpture of the churches of Quito. The technique of the sculptures in wood was intricate. After the color was laid on, the figures were highly polished by the Chinese method and often they were coated with gold and silver. The present figures date from the eighteenth century.

Early Silver Work

There is also a group of early Ecuadorean silver of fine workmanship, loaned by Maj. and Mrs. Conger, and another of plates and a tall pitcher belonging to Colonel Gorgas of Panama Canal fame, and loaned by Mrs. Gorgas. Altar pieces belonging to the former group show silver repousse of intricate and remarkable design which were in use in the churches. There are also chairs of tooled leather in which the early craftsmen excelled and an inlaid desk. The modern world is represented by paintings by Atahualta Villacres, whose figure paintings are interesting and interpretive of the people of Ecuador. There are also two paintings on goat's skin of natives and native beadwork quivers containing poisoned arrows with which the hunters killed their game and, often, men condemned to death.

The advent of a new artist in Washington is an event of interest, especially when the artist is of such distinguished attainments as is Ann Wolfe. The work of this sculptor is of unusual variety and originality. From the early so-called classic style, she has emerged into a modernistic style in a "Seated Couple" executed in red sandstone which is symbolic in form rather than realistic. It is highly stylized and original. A "Seated Woman" in bronze is truly sculptural, as is "My Children are Desolate Because the Enemy is Prevailing," which shows Aztec influence.

Tendencies of the Day

That Miss Wolfe has been influenced by the prevailing tendencies of the day is but natural. One can no more resist these influences than one can escape the events of the time, unless one is content to remain in a backwater pool. It is the way these influences are expressed through the artist that is interesting. The sculptor has made use of these tendencies and turned them into forms of significance. Her portrait heads are most effective. One, of Launcelot Hogben, of metalized brass is stylized, while it retains its character and individuality. Another head is as different as possible in form, yet shows strongly the personality of the sitter. There are other heads, simple in form and true to nature without any attempt to stylize. "Negroid Prayer" in cast stone and "Dancing Couple" in cement are representative of two opposite life expressions, prayer and the dance. Both are of strong human emotion.

Ann Wolfe has had a one-man show in Worcester, Mass., arranged by Francis Taylor, director of the Metropolitan Museum in New York. She has studied with the famous French sculptor Despieu in Paris and has a cosmopolitan outlook in her work. Without doubt Miss Wolfe will add to the increasing richness of the art life in Washington which bids fair to equal that of many of the European capitals before the war.

This afternoon at the Library of Congress there opens the largest and most important exhibit that has ever been arranged by it. It is called "O Pioneers" from Walt Whitman's famous poem. In fact Whitman has been the inspiration of the arrangement and sequence of the illustrations and of the books that mark the several epochs of development. The material has, of course, been taken from the departments of the Library—historical, economical and factual, together with Currier and Ives prints which illustrate the phases of the growth of the country as a whole.

Illustrative Prints

The prints are illustrative of the pictorial life of the adventurous West and the courageous pioneers in their trek over the mountains and plains of the far-reaching terrain toward the Pacific Ocean. The vivid life of danger, adventure and melodrama is fully illustrated. It brings to mind forgotten episodes of the struggles that were bred into the sinews of our forefathers and it heartens us today in the current struggle. Hope is renewed that the descendants of these brave pioneers will be equal to the task today.

Several of the early artists who created the Currier and Ives prints and lithographs are A. F. Tait, G. H. Durrie, and Fanny Palmer who drew most of the early landscapes. These prints are taken from the Fine Arts division of the library. They are of interest historically rather than artistically but give a vivid picture of the life of the pioneers which is adequate to the subject. Mr. Archibald McLeish, librarian of the Library of Congress, has written an inspiring foreword and the magic lines of Whitman have contributed a bugle note to arouse the feelings of every patriotic American to comprehend something of the magnificent achievement of the "Pioneers of America" and their will to continue and increase this achievement today.

Next Sunday afternoon at the Phillips Gallery there will be the opening of the Christmas exhibition of paintings and drawings sent in by Washington and nearby Maryland and Virginia artists, which will continue through December 27. The paintings are provided to give the artists an opportunity to show their work, which otherwise they might not have, and to give the public a chance to get original paintings at a moderate cost which will help the artist and provide something of value for the purchaser. At the same time there will be an exhibition of paintings by the internationally known painter Marc Chagall whose flair for fantasy is well known. The Chagall paintings will be on view through December 6. Many of the Chagalls belong to the Phillips Gallery, the others having been loaned for this occasion.

Contemporary Work

On this coming Tuesday the Whitney Museum in New York will open its annual exhibition of contemporary painting and sculpture of American art. All mediums will be included in the current show. Mrs. Julia Force, director of the museum, says: "It is heartening to find that the artists working under the shadow of war have used their talents to the utmost, apparently feeling a deeper sense of responsibility toward their part in sustaining our cultural life through this crisis and have almost without exception succeeded in doing some of the finest work of their careers." There are over a hundred artists who represent modern expression in painting and sculpture in the forthcoming show.

At the new Children's Art Center at 1744 K Street there will be an opening exhibition of paintings by the children, together with a children's book show. Authors will autograph the books and toys for the underprivileged children. The opening scheduled for the gallery and book show will be next Sunday from 3 until 6.

This eighteenth century wood carving of "The Three Wise Men" is on display in the exhibition of Ecuadorean art which will open on Wednesday afternoon at the Pan American Union. It is an example of the old Ecuadorean woodcraft

Symphony Conductor Reviews Concerts To Be Given This Week

(This week the National Symphony Orchestra presents two concerts in Constitution Hall, the first this afternoon with Percy Grainger as soloist and the second on Wednesday night with Egon Petri as soloist. The following notes on the programs have been prepared by the orchestra's conductor for the convenience of patrons.)

By Dr. Hans Kindler

'Come, Sweet Death'

We will start today's concert with one of Bach's high moments, namely, the "Come, Sweet Death," transcribed for orchestra.

'Francesca da Rimini'

In "Francesca da Rimini" Chaikovski has given a pendant to his other symphonic poem, "Romeo and Juliet." He calls the latter "Fantasie-Overture" and the former "Fantasie After Dante," but both are, in length and form, symphonic, and certainly the text in both, as well as the music, may be called poetic. Both were written at about the same time in the composer's life when his musical gifts were blossoming in profusion and his craftsmanship gave him complete command of his exuberant fantasy.

The music to "Francesca da Rimini" was inspired by the passage in Dante's "Inferno" where Dante, guided by his mentor, Virgil, arrives in the second circle of the damned. There he sees the souls of those who during life guiltily indulged in the delights of the senses and whose punishment now consists of being exposed to eternal darkness and perpetual storms. Among those he recognizes Francesca da Rimini, who tells him how she and the youthful Paolo were reading the story of Lancelot. When they arrived at the incident where Lancelot kissed his beloved, Paolo dropped the book and tremblingly kissed Francesca. "That day we read no more." Dante continues:

"One shadow spoke, the other one
Wept bitterly so that my senses left me
For pity—and I grew pale as death—
And fell, like a dead body falls."

The wonderfully moving text is an ideal subject for a symphonic poem and Chaikovski made the most of his opportunity. At the outset the music eloquently describes Dante's entrance into the infernal regions. A vision of moving objects, but dark, not clearly visible, seems to be the next episode. Then after a brief return to the introduction, the main movement starts. Quite clearly, realistically even, like a lithograph by Gustave Dore of the same subject, the ever-moving, wind-swept figures seem to be rushing by, until the full despair of the drama Dante witnessed is depicted in a fortissimo outburst of the entire orchestra. A short return to the first moments of horror, and then, in a solo clarinet passage, the lovely figure of Francesca is conjured up. It is one of Chaikovski's greatest, most tender, melodic inspirations. The theme has three distinct divisions—a gentle, innocent first part which is followed in the violins by 13 bars of a more passionate nature, gradually growing and again subsiding; and a wistful, nearly pensive short coda figure, thus giving the whole a near-psychological significance.

With this theme, Chaikovski creates, in a series of quasi variations, a picture of growing love and passion. The different aspects of this love, the change from the innocence of the beginning of the Francesca theme to the more passionate second part in the violins, later the persuasive entrance of the theme in the cellos (that most amorous of all instruments!), then the growing, ever-increasing intensity of this music, the gradual introduction of new caressing rhythms and ideas until at last this love theme bursts forth from the entire orchestra—all these tend to make this one of the really great love episodes in the literature of music. Toward the end, ominously, the horns, with a subdued, threatening fanfare, announce the inevitable doom; the moment of rest allowed Francesca to tell her tragic tale is at an end; she and Paolo must take up again their punishment; and the work ends with a climactic repetition of the main movement, a whirlwind finish of truly medieval splendor

'Lilac Bush in Bloom'

"Lilac Bush in Bloom" is a short, atmospheric work by Arnold Cornelissen, whose symphony received the largest number of votes in the competition of original new works which was held by the National Symphony in 1941. I have invited the composer to conduct his own work in this performance, and he has graciously accepted my invitation.

Percy Grainger

We will also present Percy Grainger, both as pianist and composer. The perennial youthfulness and effervescence of Percy Grainger and his music constitute an irresistible force meeting no immovable object. On the contrary, they arrived in a musical world in which there had been too much that was either purely experimental or effete. And as such the refreshing but by no means over-obvious simplicity and vigor of his music was bound to have a strongly contrasting popular appeal.

As a pianist, Grainger has done yoeman work not only by splendid performances of the classics, but by giving us in Washington first performances of works like J. A. Carpenter's Concerto and Faure's Ballade. Today, besides partaking of the piano part in his Suite, he will play the nearly unknown concerto by the great English composer, Frederick Delius. Grainger's personality in the annals of music always reminds me of a charming and very bad little boy who is astonished that you should think him bad, and who fully intends continuing on the same path regardless of consequences.

In our second subscription concert on Wednesday next, Egon Petri, the Dutch pianistic giant, will take part in the grandest of all piano concertos, the Brahms B flat, and the orchestra's major offering will be the superb second symphony by Sibelius.

William Leach, baritone, who will sing Friday night at the Beach Birthday concert in Phillips Memorial Gallery

Elena de Sayn, violinist, who has arranged two concerts on Friday and Saturday nights in Phillips Memorial Gallery in honor of the American composer, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach

Two Concerts Will Honor Mrs. Beach

In tribute to the American composer, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, who recently celebrated her seventy-fifth birthday, two concerts of her compositions will be given Friday and Saturday nights in Phillips Memorial Gallery. The artists participating in the programs are Elena de Sayn, violin; Myron Kahn, violin; Louise Ehrman, violoncello; Harold Niessenson, violist; Julia Elbogen, piano; Bernice Rickman Gordon, soprano; William Leach, barytone, and Kenton F. Terry, flute.

Friday's program offers the sonata for violin and piano, Op. 34; the quintet for flute and strings, Op. 80; Ten Variations on a Balkan Theme for piano, Op. 60, and the following songs: "The Wandering Knight," "Across the World," "My Star," "Stella Viatoris," "Mirage" and "Rendezvous."

On Saturday there will be the first local performance of a one-movement String Quartet, still in manuscript. This program includes the Piano Trio, Op. 150; the Romance for violin, Op. 23; the Piano Quintet, Op. 67; and the following songs: "I Sent My Heart to Thee," "June" and "Ecstasy."

Tickets for these concerts are available only by mail from Miss Elena de Sayn, 1026 Fifteenth Street Northwest.

Saturday Opera Broadcast To End Careful Preparation

By Ernest L. Schier

When an estimated ten million opera lovers tune in to the opening broadcast of the Metropolitan Opera next Saturday at 2 p. m., (WMAL-Blue) months of preparation by an army of artists will begin to bear fruit. The new broadcast season will be introduced by the voice of the popular Lily Pons, singing the title role of "Lucia di Lammermoor."

Painstaking preparation to meet broadcasting requirements will also go into making of a perfect performance. Circuit wires, amplifiers and tubes, inactive for the past eight months in the opera house, have been checked for proper action. Nine microphones placed about the auditorium and stage, 20 plug stations set in the footlights, backstage, and at various other posts, have been tested and replaced where necessary.

During the broadcast, three engineers will be stationed in the master control room of the network, one in a studio and two at the scene of the performance. Here the production men check with the stage manager on the timing of each act, following every cue and reporting to announcer Milton J. Cross in his broadcasting booth on one side of the grand tier.

This new broadcast series will be dedicated to the United Nations, and each program will pay tribute to one of the nations, with distinguished visitors from that country as guests of honor. The above-named Mr. Cross again will act as master of ceremonies for the various intermission features.

War Victory Party

One intermission period each week wil be known as the "Opera War Victory Party," at which time listeners will hear from prominent singers and leading nationals of our allies.

The "Opera Forum Quiz" will continue to function during the second intermission period, presenting the noted triumvirate of the musical world—Olin Downes, Robert Lawrence and Dr. Sigmund Spaeth.

A staff of script writers and production men already are at work preparing to handle the fan mail, which runs into the thousands every week, each letter requiring an answer.

When there is a third intermission, a new feature will be offered, to be called "The Metropolitan Opera Column of the Air," bringing the radio audience current news and anecdotes about the world of the opera.

The exigencies of war having brought to a sudden end the tradition of presenting new European artists, the American singer is at long last finding his place in the sun, and this, perhaps, is one of the most significant items of the forthcoming season.

It is fortunate for the Met that the opera-supporting public has for many years been increasingly eager to welcome native singers who possess the necessary ability. It is now up to the powers-that-be to hasten the discovery and development of American-born singers.

Radio Helps Opera

Radio already has been enlisted as a means of weeding out singers of the caliber and range required by opera. To this extent, the Metropolitan Auditions of the Air has been an active aid in filling the depleted ranks of Met singers. Three new winners were inducted for the season 1941-42, bringing the total from this source alone to 17.

Another new program is in the making which will also help to speed the development of young hopefuls. To be known as "Metropolitan Opera, U. S. A.," the new program will feature Lawrence Tibbett, great American baritone, as master of ceremonies. The purpose of the broadcast will be to afford young artists, whose voices have won them coveted contracts to sing with the Met this season, the opportunity of making themselves known to the public by singing leading arias over the half-hour show.

The first two artists to appear will be Astrid Varnay, a native of Stockholm, and Walter Cassel of Council Bluffs, Iowa. It was Miss Varnay who made the spectacular debut on December 12 of last year as Sieglinde, when illness prevented Lotte Lehmann from appearing in the Wagnerian role. Cassel arrived by the more-devious route of cattle man on a freight train after receiving encouragement from Tibbett when the latter was in Omaha doing a concert.

The consideration of whether the opera has any legitimate place in the American scene of today has been anticipated by General Manager Edward Johnson in the closing paragraph of his annual report on the Metropolitan Opera Association.

In discussing whether or not we are fiddling while Rome burns, Johnson says, "We may believe that this is a war of nerves and that to win the war physically the American people must gird themselves spiritually. We may hold the conviction that opera and all it stands for is a manifestation of the very things for which our country is fighting. It may be so.

"But these are no more than arguments and can prevail only so far as to determine us to keep the opera open for the public. Apparently . . . there is a widespread eagerness for the continuation of the Metropolitan Opera. If this is so, the 1942-43 season will be a success. Only the public itself can make it come true."

Ecuadorean Show Opens Wednesday

Exhibit Will Honor Visit of President Del Rio and Display Little-Known Art

By Ada Rainey

In honor of the visit of President Carlos Alberto Arroyo del Rio of Ecuador an exhibition of Ecuadorean art has been arranged at the Pan American Union which will be opened with a reception on Wednesday afternoon. This will be an important social as well as artistic event, and will stress the significant part that art plays in the diplomatic and cultural relations between the two republics. The high development of painting, sculpture and architecture in Ecuador is scarcely realized in our country except by the few enthusiasts who have made a special study of this aspect of its culture.

It is known, of course, that wood sculpture has attained high development in Spain, the mother of the civilization of most of our neighbors to the south, but that this art was also highly developed in South America is not so well understood. A Washington collector, however, was definitely aware of the beauty and importance of this phase of art and made a collection of wood sculpture. The late D. C. Stapleton collected examples of these sculptures and the figures are loaned in his memory. They constitute the largest collection of these sculptures in this country as only a few of this sort of wood carved figures are owned by even the large museums.

Varied Interest

The present group is of remarkable workmanship and intrinsic interest. The figures are of the Magi, saints and other subjects used in the adornment of the churches in Quito. These sculptures now on view are small in size and beautiful in the delicacy of the carving and the charm of their inspiration. They have a quality quite individual coming from the influences which filtered into Ecuador from Spain, Flanders and Italy.

Many artists and monks were sent to the New World who were highly trained and contributed to the glory of the architecture and sculpture of the churches of Quito. The technique of the sculptures in wood was intricate. After the color was laid on, the figures were highly polished by the Chinese method and often they were coated with gold and silver. The present figures date from the eighteenth century.

Early Silver Work

There is also a group of early Ecuadorean silver of fine workmanship, loaned by Maj. and Mrs. Conger, and another of plates and a tall pitcher belonging to Colonel Gorgas of Panama Canal fame, and loaned by Mrs. Gorgas. Altar pieces belonging to the former group show silver repousse of intricate and remarkable design which were in use in the churches. There are also chairs of tooled leather in which the early craftsmen excelled and an inlaid desk. The modern world is represented by paintings by Atahualta Villacres, whose figure paintings are interesting and interpretive of the people of Ecuador. There are also two paintings on goat's skin of natives and native beadwork quivers containing poisoned arrows with which the hunters killed their game and, often, men condemned to death.

The advent of a new artist in Washington is an event of interest, especially when the artist is of such distinguished attainments as is Ann Wolfe. The work of this sculptor is of unusual variety and originality. From the early so-called classic style, she has emerged into a modernistic style in a "Seated Couple" executed in red sandstone which is symbolic in form rather than realistic. It is highly stylized and original. A "Seated Woman" in bronze is truly sculptural, as is "My Children are Desolate Because the Enemy is Prevailing," which shows Aztec influence.

That Miss Wolfe has been influenced by the prevailing tendencies of the day is but natural. One can no more resist these influences than one can escape the events of the time, unless one is content to remain in a backwater pool. It is the way these influences are expressed through the artist that is interesting. The sculptor has made use of these tendencies and turned them into forms of significance. Her portrait heads are most effective. One, of Launcelot Hogben, of metalized brass is stylized, while it retains its character and individuality. Another head is as different as possible in form, yet shows strongly the personality of the sitter. There are other heads, simple in form and true to nature without any attempt to stylize. "Negroid Prayer" in cast stone and "Dancing Couple" in cement are representative of two opposite life expressions, prayer and the dance. Both are of strong human emotion.

Ann Wolfe has had a one-man show in Worcester, Mass., arranged by Francis Taylor, director of the Metropolitan Museum in New York. She has studied with the famous French sculptor Despieu in Paris and has a cosmopolitan outlook in her work. Without doubt Miss Wolfe will add to the increasing richness of the art life in Washington which bids fair to equal that of many of the European capitals before the war.

This afternoon at the Library of Congress there opens the largest and most important exhibit that has ever been arranged by it. It is called "O Pioneers" from Walt Whitman's famous poem. In fact Whitman has been the inspiration of the arrangement and sequence of the illustrations and of the books that mark the several epochs of development. The material has, of course, been taken from the departments of the Library—historical, economical and factual, together with Currier and Ives prints which illustrate the phases of the growth of the country as a whole.

Illustrative Prints

The prints are illustrative of the pictorial life of the adventurous West and the courageous pioneers in their trek over the mountains and plains of the far-reaching terrain toward the Pacific Ocean. The vivid life of danger, adventure and melodrama is fully illustrated. It brings to mind forgotten episodes of the struggles that were bred into the sinews of our forefathers and it heartens us today in the current struggle. Hope is renewed that the descendants of these brave pioneers will be equal to the task today.

Several of the early artists who created the Currier and Ives prints and lithographs are A. F. Tait, G. H. Durrie, and Fanny Palmer who drew most of the early landscapes. These prints are taken from the Fine Arts division of the library. They are of interest historically rather than artistically but give a vivid picture of the life of the pioneers which is adequate to the subject. Mr. Archibald McLeish, librarian of the Library of Congress, has written an inspiring foreword and the magic lines of Whitman have contributed a bugle note to arouse the feelings of every patriotic American to comprehend something of the magnificent achievement of the "Pioneers of America" and their will to continue and increase this achievement today.

Next Sunday afternoon at the Phillips Gallery there will be the opening of the Christmas exhibition of paintings and drawings sent in by Washington and nearby Maryland and Virginia artists, which will continue through December 27. The paintings are provided to give the artists an opportunity to show their work, which otherwise they might not have, and to give the public a chance to get original paintings at a moderate cost which will help the artist and provide something of value for the purchaser. At the same time there will be an exhibition of paintings by the internationally known painter Marc Chagall whose flair for fantasy is well known. The Chagall paintings will be on view through December 6. Many of the Chagalls belong to the Phillips Gallery, the others having been loaned for this occasion.

Contemporary Work

On this coming Tuesday the Whitney Museum in New York will open its annual exhibition of contemporary painting and sculpture of American art. All mediums will be included in the current show. Mrs. Julia Force, director of the museum, says: "It is heartening to find that the artists working under the shadow of war have used their talents to the utmost, apparently feeling a deeper sense of responsibility toward their part in sustaining our cultural life through this crisis and have almost without exception succeeded in doing some of the finest work of their careers." There are over a hundred artists who represent modern expression in painting and sculpture in the forthcoming show.

At the new Children's Art Center at 1744 K Street there will be an opening exhibition of paintings by the children, together with a children's book show. Authors will autograph the books and toys for the underprivileged children. The opening scheduled for the gallery and book show will be next Sunday from 3 until 6.

Symphony Conductor Reviews Concerts To Be Given This Week

(This week the National Symphony Orchestra presents two concerts in Constitution Hall, the first this afternoon with Percy Grainger as soloist and the second on Wednesday night with Egon Petri as soloist. The following notes on the programs have been prepared by the orchestra's conductor for the convenience of patrons.)

By Dr. Hans Kindler

'Come, Sweet Death'

We will start today's concert with one of Bach's high moments, namely, the "Come, Sweet Death," transcribed for orchestra.

'Francesca da Rimini'

In "Francesca da Rimini" Chaikovski has given a pendant to his other symphonic poem, "Romeo and Juliet." He calls the latter "Fantasie-Overture" and the former "Fantasie After Dante," but both are, in length and form, symphonic, and certainly the text in both, as well as the music, may be called poetic. Both were written at about the same time in the composer's life when his musical gifts were blossoming in profusion and his craftsmanship gave him complete command of his exuberant fantasy.

The music to "Francesca da Rimini" was inspired by the passage in Dante's "Inferno" where Dante, guided by his mentor, Virgil, arrives in the second circle of the damned. There he sees the souls of those who during life guiltily indulged in the delights of the senses and whose punishment now consists of being exposed to eternal darkness and perpetual storms. Among those he recognizes Francesca da Rimini, who tells him how she and the youthful Paolo were reading the story of Lancelot. When they arrived at the incident where Lancelot kissed his beloved, Paolo dropped the book and tremblingly kissed Francesca. 'That day we read no more." Dante continues:

"One shadow spoke, the other one
Wept bitterly so that my senses left me
For pity—and I grew pale as death—
And fell, like a dead body falls."

The wonderfully moving text is an ideal subject for a symphonic poem and Chaikovski made the most of his opportunity. At the outset the music eloquently describes Dante's entrance into the infernal regions. A vision of moving objects, but dark, not clearly visible, seems to be the next episode. Then after a brief return to the introduction, the main movement starts. Qutie clearly, realistically even, like a lithograph by Gustave Dore of the same subject, the ever-moving, wind-swept figures seem to be rushing by, until the full despair of the drama Dante witnessed is depicted in a fortissimo outburst of the entire orchestra. A short return to the first moments of horror, and then, in a solo clarinet passage, the lovely figure of Francesca is conjured up. It is one of Chaikovski's greatest, most tender, melodic inspirations. The theme has three distinct divisions—a gentle, innocent first part which is followed in the violins by 13 bars of a more passionate nature, gradually growing and again subsiding; and a wistful, nearly pensive short coda figure, thus giving the whole a near-psychological significance.

With this theme, Chaikovski creates, in a series of quasi variations, a picture of growing love and passion. The different aspects of this love, the change from the innocence of the beginning of the Francesca theme to the more passionate second part in the violins, later the persuasive entrance of the theme in the cellos (that most amorous of all instruments!), then the growing, ever-increasing intensity of this music, the gradual introduction of new caressing rhythms and ideas until at last this love theme bursts forth from the entire orchestra—all these tend to make this one of the really great love episodes in the literature of music. Toward the end, ominously, the horns, with a subdued, threatening fanfare, announce the inevitable doom; the moment of rest allowed Francesca to tell her tragic tale is at an end; she and Paolo must take up again their punishment; and the work ends with a climactic repetition of the main movement, a whirlwind finish of truly medieval splendor

'Lilac Bush in Bloom'

"Lilac Bush in Bloom" is a short, atmospheric work by Arnold Cornelissen, whose symphony received the largest number of votes in the competition of original new works which was held by the National Symphony in 1941. I have invited the composer to conduct his own work in this performance, and he has graciously accepted my invitation.

Percy Grainger

We will also present Percy Grainger, both as pianist and composer. The perennial youthfulness and effervescence of Percy Grainger and his music constitute an irresistible force meeting no immovable object. On the contrary, they arrived in a musical world in which there had been too much that was either purely experimental or effete. And as such the refreshing but by no means over-obvious simplicity and vigor of his music was bound to have a strongly contrasting popular appeal.

As a pianist, Grainger has done yoeman work not only by splendid performances of the classics, but by giving us in Washington first performances of works like J. A. Carpenter's Concerto and Faure's Ballade. Today, besides partaking of the piano part in his Suite, he will play the nearly unknown concerto by the great English composer, Frederick Delius. Grainger's personality in the annals of music always reminds me of a charming and very bad little boy who is astonished that you should think him bad, and who fully intends continuing on the same path regardless of consequences.

In our second subscription concert on Wednesday next, Egon Petri, the Dutch pianistic giant, will take part in the grandest of all piano concertos, the Brahms B flat, and the orchestra's major offering will be the superb second symphony by Sibelius.

William Leach, baritone, who will sing Friday night at the Beach Birthday concert in Phillips Memorial Gallery

Elena de Sayn, violinist, who has arranged two concerts on Friday and Saturday nights in Phillips Memorial Gallery in honor of the American composer, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach

Miss Gladys Gomien of Santiago, Chile, teaches Spanish informally at the Children's Museum at 4215 Massachusetts Avenue Northwest

Education

The Childrens' Museum Offers Complete Courses in Spanish

Twice a week, after school hours, a group of young Washingtonians are learning Spanish in the first complete course in the language ever offered at the Children's Museum in Washington, 4215 Massachusetts Avenue Northwest.

From now until June, the boys and girls who range from 10 to 15 years old are meeting on Thursday afternoons and Saturday mornings, in one of the parlors of the museum, to learn informally the speech habits, and customs of their neighbors to the South. Tutoring them is a young woman from Chile, Miss Gladys Gomien of Santiago.

Interests in the fields of art, drama, nature and other activities have been developed in the children who have taken part in the recreational program offered by the District-supported Children's Museum, but this is the first language opportunity ever given.

Informal Classes

The lessons are held in an informal manner. Children sit on the floor if they feel inclined, learn conversational habits in Spanish, take part in games, songs and folklore of the Spanish culture, and by their own interest and absorption are being educated in more ways than just learning a language, the leader of the group points out.

Miss Gomien is a student in graduate work at the National Catholic School of Social Service, here on scholarship from Chile. Five years ago she obtained her social service degree at the Santiago School, and since has been engaged in case and group work in her chosen profession.

Chilean "plantation" children, comparable to the farm children of our country who do not have the advantages of the more prosperous farm families in our rural regions, appealed to Miss Gomien especially, and five years ago she was the first organizer of group activities in Chile in the rural sections.

Today, the program has grown, under the Social Union of Agriculture (Union Social de Agricultores) and Miss Gomien is a supervisor in that branch of social work. There are now 60 group workers going into nine plantations, serving some 600 families, in the rural community activity in which Miss Gomien pioneered.

Previous Experience

Miss Gomien is the daughter of Mrs. Amelia Careces Gomien, and the late Frank Gomien. Her father was a financier in the government's treasury department. She has a brother, Richard Gomien, who is a government engineer in the department of agriculture.

Upon Miss Gomien's completion of the course in the Santiago Social Service School, which is 13 years old, she engaged herself in working also in individual and family cases in enterprises manufacturing hempen bags, paper, and producing of milk, this being in addition to her rural service.

This year, in January, she was one of two Chilean graduates of accredited institutions of learning chosen to represent her country on scholarships offered by the Institute of International Education, and flew here by passenger clipper from Chile to Miami, in three days, starting her graduate work at the National Catholic School of Social Service in early February.

To Form Scout Troop

During the summer months, Miss Gomien attended the Girl Scout leadership camp, Edith Macy, in Pleasantville, N. Y. When she returns to Santiago next June she plans to organize a troop, and will work with Mrs. Claude Bowers, wife of the United States Ambassador to Chile, in this connection. It will not be the first troop in Chile, as there are a few already organized.

Following completion of the Girl Scout camp work, the National Catholic School of Social Service arranged for the Chilean student a trip to the Mid-West.

Before returning here for the graduate work now in progress, Miss Gomien studied under Bernstein and Kaiser at the New York School of Social Service for the second summer term. She lived at the International House and worked with children, visited courses in clinics and did field work at the Union Settlement. Now, Miss Gomien is enrolled in the second year class at the Catholic service school here, and is also studying special related subjects at Catholic University of America, with her field work including her Spanish group at the Children's Museum, and visits to different service agencies in the District.

Physical Training Program At Catholic U. Compulsory

The compulsory character of the physical training program for all full-time lay students at Catholic University was emphasized the past week by the issuance of notice to the student body that nonattendance at athletic classes will result in severe penalties.

With the approval of Right Rev. Msgr. P. J. McCormick, acting rector of the university, students who fail to attend the physical education classes were notified that they will not be eligible for their academic degrees, nor will they be recommended for appointment to any branch of the reserve corps or for military deferment to continue their school work.

The physical instruction program was inaugurated at Catholic University early in October, and made compulsory for all lay men who were taking full-time courses, unless excused by the medical director. In general, the classes have been well attended, but some students have not had perfect attendance records.

Leniency Not Justified

Dr. Martin R. P. McGuire, dean of the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences, and chairman of the university's council of national defense, under whose jurisdiction the physical program functions, said yesterday that the serious purpose to which the program is directed would not justify any leniency being extended to students for inexcusable absences.

"The alternative to regular attendance at the physical education classes," Dr. McGuire said, "is a frustration of one's college career and the failure to obtain either deferment to continue school work or to be recommended for military essential duty or for civilian posts in the government."

Students will be notified on or about December 1 of the university's record of their attendance at the physical education classes. For those who have missed, an opportunity will be given to make up the classes which they failed to attend before the end of the present semester.

Text of Regulation

The text of the regulation affecting physical training delinquents follows: "A full-time student who is required by the acting rector's notice of September 25, 1942, to take the compulsory physical training program and who fails to participate in the program in accordance with conditions laid down for him by the director of physical education and the medical director, must discharge his delinquencies to the satisfaction of the director of physical education before:

(1) He can be recommended for either a degree or a reserve branch of the Armed Forces or any governmental position or military deferment; or before:

(2) A transcript of his academic record may be released.

Delinquencies shall be computed from Monday, October 19, 1942, and a statement of these delinquencies and of the penalty attached shall be sent to him signed by the chairman of the university's council on national defense and by the appropriate academic dean, on or about December 1, 1942, and near the beginning and end of each semester and summer session thereafter in which the student continues in residence on a full-time basis."

P.-T. A. Institute Will Discuss Effect of War on Colleges

The effect of war on colleges will constitute a major topic of discussion at the Sixth Annual Parent-Teacher Institute to be held at the George Washington University, December 1 and 2, Dean James Harold Fox of the University's School of Education has announced.

Representing local colleges in a general panel following Dr. Zook's address will be Dr. Cloyd Heck Marvin, president of George Washington; Dr. Paul Douglass, president of American University; Dr. Walter E. Hager, president of Wilson Teachers College; the Rev. Edmund A. Walsh, S. J., vice president of Georgetown University; the Rev. George Johnson, associate professor of education at Catholic University; and Dr. Harry C. Byrd, president of the University of Maryland.

This portion of the two-day meeting will be held in the afternoon session of December 1. Morning sessions begin at 10 and afternoon sessions at 1:30 in Room 102, Hall of Government.

Juvenile Crime

The problem of juvenile delinquency in wartime will be another major subject considered during the meeting, which will include discussions of all wartime problems affecting children. Lady Simon of the British Embassy, who is touring the United States with her husband as official lecturer of the British government, will discuss wartime juvenile delinquency in England.

Capt. Rhoda Millikin, chief of the Women's Bureau of the Metropolitan Police Department, will review wartime teen-age problems in Washington. In the same session Capt. P. D. Workman, chief of chaplains of the United States Navy, will speak on current spiritual needs.

Speakers and panels for other sessions of the conference, as announced by Dean Fox, are:

A.; Mrs. Hildegard Davenport of the John Eaton School P.-T. A.; and S. J. Cathran, legislative chairman of the District Congress of Parents and Teachers.

American U. Homecoming Set Saturday

Annual homecoming festivities will be observed Saturday on the campus of the American University College of Arts and Sciences. Highlighting the program will be the opening basketball game of the season with the American University Eagles meeting the Coast Guard team from Baltimore.

Curtailing the variety of social activities usually presented, an alumni reception in Great Hall, sponsored by the Junior Women's Guild, will be held immediately following the game. Ellsworth Tompkins, Class of '31, president of the association, is being assisted by Ensign Worthington Houghton, '36; Ethel Smith, '31, and Meta Hoover, '35.

Wayne Thompson, director of college forensics, has announced that two contests in speech and debating will be sponsored by the speech department. George Washington, Georgetown, Catholic and Maryland Universities have been invited to participate with American University delegates in a discussion on the topic: "Should the curricula and the personnel of all colleges and universities be regimented in behalf of the war effort?" Another contest is a debate which will be a preliminary for the National Intercollegiate Radio Prize Debates, which offer cash prizes to both sectional and national winners.

Students Favor

A poll conducted by three students of the Social Research class in the department of sociology revealed that 74 per cent of the students tested were in favor of having Japanese-American students attend American University. Fifty-seven per cent stated that they should be allowed to live in the dormitories while 17 per cent indicated that they should be allowed only to attend classes.

The poll, which included one-third of the student body of the College of Arts and Sciences, was made by three seniors; Miss Jane Sattler, 806 Rittenhouse Street Northwest; Miss Mary King, 712 Allison Street Northwest, and Herbert Wood, Port Angeles, Wash. Poll methods are now being the class topic of discussion and these results include: "Do you favor a poll tax?" By States individually—30 per cent; by national law but States setting the amount—9 per cent; by national law setting amount—6 per cent; not at all—55 per cent. Fifty-six per cent of the testees indicated that they thought India should be given complete independence after the war.

Following the mass, the members of the pre-school sang "Happy Feast Day" and presented Mother Rose Elizabeth with individual roses in the foyer of the academy.

Miss Eileen Mudd, president of the Student Council, extended the greetings of the college students to their president at the assembly which was held at 11 o'clock. Miss Jacquelin Bauman, prefect of the sodality, presented Mother Rose Elizabeth with a spiritual bouquet from the college students. The college glee club offered a program of several songs.

Columbus Offers A Special Course For Raid Wardens

Dean James J. Hayden has announced that the Columbus University School of Law in cooperation with the Dupont Circle area, Post No. 21 of the Air Raid Warden Service, has started the training of more than 1600 air raid wardens in the law and regulations governing blackouts.

The first lecture in the series was given Thursday evening in the law library by Prof. Robert E. Lynch of the law school faculty. It was experimental in character and was given principally for the benefit of leaders in the work of civilian defense.

It is planned to explain the blackout law and the regulations applicable thereto in a single lecture to separate groups of wardens numbering about 100 in each group. This work forms a part of the contribution of the law school to the war effort. Ever since Pearl Harbor the air raid warden service has had a large office provided by the law school. Thousands of persons have been trained in first aid procedure and in bomb and gas work in the class rooms also of the school.

Sports Appeal To Students At Sweet Briar

Hockey, dancing, tennis and walking have established themselves as the most popular forms of exercise for juniors and seniors at Sweet Briar College this fall, as shown by the first survey of the new physical education program for upperclassmen. According to the plan which was adopted last June, each upperclass student is required to take not less than one hour of approved exercise twice each week.

Miss Harriet Rogers, head of the department of physical education, has just released figures covering the first month under the new program, showing that as many as 33 per cent of the juniors and 26 per cent of the seniors played hockey in one week, while the same proportion of seniors and 26 per cent of the juniors joined dancing classes in another week.

Taking advantage of the pleasant weather, large numbers in both classes took their exercise in the form of tennis in a given week and even more took long walks. Totals in each sport vary from week to week, largely dependent on the weather, apparently. During October there were more girls riding than in any single month in the past three years.

Because of Sweet Briar's location, a wide choice of sports is made possible and an increased number of girls can be accommodated in the various sports with no increase in staff or equipment. Lacrosse, bicycling, archery, squash, badminton and hikes to the Outing Cabin are also included in the fall and winter sports available, as well as basketball and volleyball.

Although two hours of supervised physical education per week have long been required of students in the two lower classes, the additional requirement of two hours per week for upperclass students was adopted in line with the wartime emphasis upon physical fitness.

Newport Gains Prominence As Arsenal

Newport, founded in 1639 and famed as a fashionable summer resort, is becoming Uncle Sam's No. 1 of Narragansett's great arsenals. Seen from its scenic harbor where the royalty of yachtdom gather are the Naval Training Station, War College Hospital, the Torpedo Station, U. S. S. Constellation, Old Fort Adams and other wartime activities. The promise of many fall and winter sightseers and vacationists to visit the armed forces is already being manifested, according to the "Travelers Checque" Survey Bureau of the American Express in their patriotic series of American Highways and Rivers of History.

With the flocking of new visitors, the riddle of Newport's ancient tower, America's most enigmatic building is again being discussed anew. "Architecturally and historically unique, the Mystery Tower has long puzzled antiquarians in a prolonged controversy of challenging theories as to its origin," states Douglas Malcolm of the company, who tells how the oddly arched roundstone structure has many dramatic versions. The Norse theory of a church built in the twelfth century for the vanished colony of Norsemen now holds attention as the construction closely resembles the ancient built "Round Church" at Vardsberg, Sweden. Other pious theories are linked to ancient Viking churches in Norway and Denmark, extended to Jerusalem to the "Round Church" of the Holy Sepulchre where King Sigard of Norway led his Crusaders in the twelfth century.

In Newport's back streets of history, are the Old Colony House where the First General Assembly was held in 1739, the ancient Synagogue and the Brick Market. Among the sightseeing places in the Narragansett Arsenal is the eighteenth century architecture of East Greenwich, Old Wickford and Kingston.

Lake Worth Expects Big Winter Season Despite the War

The Gulf Stream Patio and Officers Club opened formally last Wednesday in the biggest social event in the history of Lake Worth. The Gulf Stream Hotel is now accepting guests, and many of the season's guests are already here, including the J. Vernon Harringtons, the R. E. Wrights, the E. R. Wallaces, Col. T. J. Smith, "Foxy" Hart and many others.

The Gulf Stream Hotel has been filled to capacity for the past seven years, and the management does not anticipate any change this year. So little coastal area is available for civilians this year that Lake Worth and the Gulf Stream Hotel will be one of the most popular of winter resorts.

Conservation of fuel oil in Northern and Western homes has induced rationing boards to provide gasoline for winter visitors and a few additional trains have been permitted. The American people are ingenious enough to find out how to get where they want to go, and it is expected they will want to go to Lake Worth and the Gulf Stream Hotel.

The Ocala National Forest, near Ocala, Fla., will again see the hunters take to the woods during the month of December. With the assistance of forest officials, camp grounds, rules and regulations and other valuable information will be placed at the command of those who enjoy the out-of-doors. Here is a typical camp site, showing hunters, dogs in the foreground and their quarters in the immediate background

Ocala Forest Deer Season Opens Dec. 1

Ocala, Fla., Nov. 21.—Looking forward to the opening of the deer season from December 1 to 31, Forest Ranger J. W. Cooper is getting all set for a good hunt in the Ocala National Forest, a short distance from Ocala.

Letters have just gone out from the forester's office to 2646 sportsmen who bought hunting permits in the forest last year announcing the opening of the season.

The hunting period in the wildlife management area of the Ocala Forest will continue four days a week through December—Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays excepted. The wildlife area is closed to all hunting except that of deer, panther, quail, squirrel, fox, wildcat and migratory waterfowl. All arrangements may be made for hunting in Ocala.

Hunters camping in the forest must designate their camping grounds, 11 of which are available, as follows: River Road, Lake Delancy, Mason Bay, Bills Branch, Old South Tower, Beakman Lake, Davenport Landing, Grassy Pond, Hopkins Prairie, Long Pond and Half Moon.

Hunting is facilitated by the availability of cabins, located in different parts of the vast forest area, arrangements for which may be made with the owners.

More than 100,000 visitors explored the forest area in 1941, attesting to its growing popularity as a recreation center as well as a sportsman's paradise.

The Marion County Chamber of Commerce, Ocala, is serving as an information center, tendering its services, gratis, in helping those who would like to try their luck in bagging a deer or smaller game.

Turkeys to Abound In Atlantic City Thanksgiving Day

Atlantic City, N. J., Nov. 21.—There will be more turkeys consumed here on Thanksgiving day than ever before in the history of this resort, with thousands of trainees of the Army Air Forces Technical Training Command getting "the bird" inn unlimited portions.

And looking forward to a record holiday crowd with relatives and friends of the men in the Army coming here to visit, restaurants and hotels are preparing to dish up the traditional turkey with all the fixin's, as usual. Many, in fact, will feature an exact duplicate of the Army's menu for the day, which is appetizing enough to make a gentleman want to enlist.

Here is what you'd eat in Atlantic City on Thanksgiving if you were a trainee of the TTTC:

Cream of tomato soup, crackers, roast young tom turkey with giblet gravy and sage dressing, cranberry sauce, snowflaked potatoes, candied sweet potatoes, stewed corn, buttered peas, stalk celery, baked Virginia ham with raisin sauce, green olives, sweet pickles, pumpkin pie, fruit cake, mincement pie, rye bread, Parker House rolls, coffee (um-um), cocoa, mixed nuts, mixed candies, cigars and cigarettes.

And best of all, imagine coming back again and again for more!

It's a military secret as to just how many men are going to take advantage of the above repast, but as valuable as the information might be to the enemy, it's an even money bet that Mr. and Mrs. Turkey would like to know in advance.

Or maybe they wouldn't care too much, at that, as their sacrifice is going to help keep this particular branch of Uncle Sam's Army mighty well fed.

Gas-Ration Decrease Throws Added Burden on Carriers

By Rae Lewis

"Don't Waste Transportation" is the slogan for everyone today, because all public carriers are handling the heaviest travel traffic in their histories. In the months since Pearl Harbor the railroads alone have carried three times as many soldiers as in the same months of the last war. Buses have been similarly affected, although when they changed their schedules last month in accord with the lowered speed limits, they managed to maintain all their usual runs.

Civilians are reluctant to give up the easy and frequent travel to which they have become accustomed since the last war through reduced rates, improvements in all types of accommodations and faster schedules to all sections.

Means Added Load

But with the further crimp put in the use of gasoline by this past week's reduction of gallons per ration coupon, more and more people are dependent upon the railroads and buses for transportation. Of course, there already had been a drastic cut in the number of cars on the roads as shown by counts made at toll bridges, in national parks, by highway traffic counters or gasoline tax receipts. September figures of the Public Roads Administration showed gasoline collections off 26 per cent in 32 States. This represented a 35 per cent reduction in rationed areas and 20 per cent in the unrationed. As the American Automobile Association points out, the use of cars has been affected both by the tire situation and the gasoline shortage in the rationed areas. In the remainder of the country the tire shortage has been the determining factor.

Prospects Today

So the traveler's prospects today are these:

Rail and bus lines are largely engaged in moving troops, which takes a great part of their equipment—and it is not expected that worn-out equipment can be replaced for the duration. Many servicemen hope to have their first leaves in months in the coming holiday period starting with Thanksgiving next Thursday. Either they will be going home or, if their leaves are too brief, their mothers and wives will be journeying to spend the few precious hours with them. A third class of necessary travel is done by those civilians who are obliged to go on war business or because of family illnesses. This leaves little margin for those who wish to go on private business, for a visit to the home folks or for vacations.

Recommended Plan

Therefore, if you must travel, you will be well advised to observe this plan:

Watch the advertisements to see what hotels are available. Many places, both in the North, Midsouth and South, expect to do business more or less as usual, even though many of their guests may be in uniform this year or relatives visiting servicemen. It is impossible to make any useful prediction about those hotels which will be available, as leases to the Government usually are announced without much advance notice.

If you are going to a city where you do not know the name of a hotel or boarding house, write to the secretary of the chamber of commerce, who will be glad to send you a list.

Whatever you do, don't go without being sure of a room reservation. Places which used to be seasonal resorts are now filled to overflowing with families of servicemen or defense workers, and the only way to be certain is to have a confirmation from the place where you plan to stay.

Plan your travel schedules and accommodations as far in advance as possible. It is never too early these days to make train reservations and to buy tickets.

Midweek Travel Urged

In this connection, the buses and railroads urge all those who possibly can to travel in midweek. Last information was that there will be no additional winter trains to the South this year, only the usual year-round service. It takes all the equipment for regular runs, so neither railroads nor bus lines can plan excursions or special services.

If your plans are changed, even within an hour of leaving time, cancel your reservations and turn in your tickets so that someone else can use your space. You can't tell whom you may help by this little thoughtfulness and it is a boon to the transportation companies.

For your own sake, travel light! Take only what you know you can carry yourself and no large pieces which cannot be slid under seats or onto racks. Even in stations where there are porters, there are never enough to go around. So take only one bag you know you can carry yourself and lift to a rack, and keep it with you.

"I keep saying to myself, 'They're fat only on the bottom'"

Spanish Forts Add Charm to St. Augustine

Two venerable strongholds reminiscent of the Spanish epoch, when European nations were fighting for an empire in the New World, are among Florida's national monuments preserved by Uncle Sam. Fort Marion and Fort Matanzas are impressive memorials for wartime visitors and add to St. Augustine's charm of age. Both forts are unique for their construction of coquina, or sea shells material which nature has cemented together. They recall the rivalries of Florida when Spain claimed the areas by the romantic adventure of Ponce de Leon from his discoveries in 1513, in quest of a fountain of youth. The French Huguenot claims were many years later added by the English claims on Florida.

Fort Marion, the oldest defense work still standing in the United States, was begun by the Spanish in 1672 as a protection for the town of St. Augustine. It contains four bastions with massive ramparts and is surrounded by a moat 40 feet wide, connecting the structure by drawbridge. Within one views the ancient feudal life and castle days of Spain. Besides its vast living quarters are the council rooms, store rooms, a chapel, a chamber of justice and the dungeons. Fort Matanzas, situated 16 miles south of Fort Marion, guarded the Matanzas River. It's a smaller fort and is located on an island which was the scene of the French Huguenot's massacre of 1565. St. Augustine, with its oldest house, old city gates, sea walls and ancient plaza, still bears the imprint of Spanish occupation.

Hunters to Take Their Final Fling In Pennsylvania

Harrisburg, Pa., Nov. 21.—Sportsmen will take their final fling at small game in Pennsylvania over the Thanksgiving weekend since the season closes Saturday, November 28, the State Department of Commerce reports.

Soldiers on furlough and war workers, in the role of huntsmen, will comb the small game sections of the Keystone State in a last-of-the-season attempt to get their limit of ruffed grouse, quail, wild turkey, pheasants, squirrels and rabbits.

But hardier sportsmen will be looking forward to the season for bear which opens November 18 and continues through November 21, and of course, the deer season which opens November 30 and continues through December 12. This year only male deer with two or more points to one antler can be included on the sportsmen's list.

According to the Department of Commerce many women are utilizing their day-off from war work for an excursion into the woods in search of game. Letters received in the Department indicate that both men and women feel they can combine sport with good healthy outdoor exercise as their 1942 vacations.

Requests continue to come in for hunting accommodations booklets which contain a list of available places where hunters may stay a day or more.

Record Air-Mail Shipment

The largest single air mail movement in the history of Canadian civil air transport has been handled in two Trans-Canada Air Lines' planes operating from a Canadian east coast port. It consisted of 5157 pounds of transatlantic mail, most of which was destined for points in the United States. One of the T. C. A. Lodestars was loaded exclusively with mail, which weighed 3681 pounds.

Smoky Area's Famous Bear Unsighted

Waynesville, N. C.—The Smoky region is in danger of losing its most cherished wild-life legend, because "Honest John," the huge and gentlemanly black bear, has not put in his appearance this year. Usually, "Honest John" is reported long before the hunting season opens, and some Smoky folk claim to have struck his trail last year. But even the most imaginative farmer has not sent out an Honest John bulletin this year.

Some bear hunters are fearful that the beast has either moved over into the Smoky Mountain Park, where he is safe from dog and gun, or else has died of wounds or old age in some impenetrable mountain retreat.

Most Noted in Area

Honest John is the most noted bear in North Carolina since the demise of Old Kettlefoot, who roamed the ranges for a generation and was done to death by a posse of outraged farmers on the slopes of Grandfather Mountain.

John got his name because of his nice table manners. Whenever the lack of berries and other forage drove him down into the foothills, he killed only enough stock for his needs, often returning to the scene of a kill to clean up a carcass before further marauding. Once caught in a trap, he leaves a distinctive footprint.

Hunters say he is "well over 500 pounds," which is quite probable. It is a rare year that bears over 500 pounds are not bagged in this section.

In News 10 Years

"Honest John" has been in the news for more than 10 years. Hunters claim to have trailed him, but he is a wily creature, well acquainted with the rugged terrain of the Smokies. One party three years ago claims to have chased him into the Smoky Park, where, of course, the old bear is quite safe from pursuit.

However, when and if Honest John is landed, he may disappoint his public. Old Kettlefoot was reputed to weigh 700 pounds, and he got his name from the story told by mountaineers that you couldn't cover his footprint with a kettle. Unlike Honest John he was a powerful and wanton killer, and made frequent excursions into the farming regions, slaughtering sheep and cattle apparently from sheer viciousness, since he would kill animals and leave them without feeding.

Also Quite a Ranger

Old Kettlefoot, like Honest John, ranged over a tremendous territory. He was jumped and hunted throughout the Mitchell Mountain ranges, and seemed to be as much at home on the Black Brothers as he was on Grandfather. No individual wild animal ever gained the notoriety that Kettlefoot held, and perhaps surely none was more avidly hunted.

But one New Year's Day, the old master killed a sheep on Sugar Mountain in Avery County, and another hunt was on. Bruce and Fly, veteran dogs of C. W. Wiseman, trailed him through thick laurel and rhododendron hills to his bed. Old Kettle made a couple of grumpy charges to drive them off and retired to his den. When next he poked his head out, Wiseman shot him to death.

When he was weighed, the fabulous raider came to only 442 pounds. Hunters explain that a big black bear will vary in weight more than 100 pounds from season to season, depending upon condition of forage, and that at his roly-poly best, Old Kettle might have weighed up to 600 pounds.

Fewer Yule Trees From Canada Now

Even Christmas trees feel the pinch of war this year and fewer of the Canadian variety will be available for American homes this season, say freight traffic officials of the Canadian National Railways in reporting the falling off of inquiries from "the States," coupled with government regulations preventing the use of open-top rail equipment to transport the trees from the Canadian forest sections to the United States. In previous years, Canada furnished most of Uncle Sam's yule trees. Now, the open type railway cars are urgently needed for the movement of war materials and such trees that may be shipped to the United States will be in available box or automobile freight cars.

How to Bag a Partridge

There's nothing like a plum partridge for dinner after a hard day of shoveling coal," says Bruce Pearse, Canadian National Railways fireman at Winnipeg, in telling how he bagged his latest partridge dinner. The bird flew through the cab window of Pearse's engine, breaking the glass and cutting the fireman's face, but the cut did not interfere with his appetite.

Chrysanthemums Have Had Better Than Average Year

By Crowell Baynes.

This has been a better-than-average year for chrysanthemums and a better-than-average season for testing these fall favorites. Some few of the fairly late varieties survived even the freezing weather last weekend. Many came through the lighter frosts at the end of October without much of a check. There was a wide difference in performance of the earlier varieties in response to the cold rains of October.

These are points for the chrysanthemum grower to note and make use of, both in his own garden and in those of his neighbors. There is such a wealth of really good performers that are almost weather-proof that it pays to grow the ones from which good results are to be expected. It is better to discard most of the doubtful doers unless they have some special beauty of form or color combination that makes them worth while as a gamble in spite of their tenderness and inability to take care of themselves.

Splendid Displays

There are many splendid chrysanthemum displays in Washington gardens—and many other gardens in which this glory of the late autumn does not provide the results it could and should. Now is a good time to give critical thought to deficiencies in the display and to make plans—and to make notes on the plans and perhaps a map—of how to do better next year.

Chrysanthemums, with division and replanting in order each spring, are so easy to handle and to multiply to any reasonable degree, that it is easy enough to maintain a stock of good hardy varieties and to change the color emphasis each season so that the display will never have the same appearance two seasons in succession, even though it is composed of about the same varieties. The balance can be changed sharply and easily, and the visitor's comment is likely to be that "you certainly got in a fine lot of new ones this year, didn't you?"

Good Trading Stock

Every chrysanthemum display should have a few new varieties each year. Good new ones are coming on from breeders every season, and the displays of the neighbors have good ones that are absent from your own. The only difficult feature is to be hard-hearted and discard ruthlessly any variety that does not prove its worth. It is easy enough to carry along the "pretty goods" from season to season, in the hope that next year the weather will favor them and they will make a fine display. But the chances are that the "sure fires" will make just as good a display—and ask no favors from the weather.

'Mums are good trading stock and now is a good time to arrange for exchanges with other fanciers and mark the plants from which growing shoots are to be traded in spring. For the "pretty goods" there is no better time than now to take the spading fork and make sure that they will not be around to tempt in spring.

One of the well-managed 'mum displays grows in combination with dahlias to form the rear rows of the border at the back lot line of about 70 feet in a suburban garden. The gardener is using first-class judgment as a garden architect and plant grower. There is a broad belt of chrysanthemums—nearly 40 feet of them—in the rear center of the lot with dahlia plantings right and left. Until frost there is no question but that the dahlias are the prime eye-catchers—but the 'mums add to the effect.

When frost cuts the dahlias the later chrysanthemums really come into their own and fully justify the space they have occupied all summer. This gardener makes a specialty of a long line of uniform flowers—from 15 or 20 plants—and plans his display two years in advance—white last year, yellow this year, bronze next year, perhaps. To insure plenty of divisions for the long back row of this year's garden, he planted last year substantial clumps of the yellows—four or five plants in each clump—at either end of the row of whites. These provided ample planting material. This year similar clumps of bronze at the breaks between the 'mums and the dahlias are preparing for the bronze background of 1943.

Mellowed Soil Best

It is not too early, either, to be planning the feeding of next year's display of chrysanthemums. They are gross feeders and thrive best in a rich soil that is well mellowed with an abundance of decayed organic matter—manure for first choice, of course, but any of the substitutes will serve provided it is spaded in deep and thoroughly now—leaves, straw, compost, or green garbage. 'Mums can do with a lot of rough fertilizer and with the water, the humus will absorb and hold until the rapidly developing plants call for moisture.

If the garden plan calls for 'mums in practcially the same position year after year, the soil cannot be spaded deep each fall unless plants are lifted and transplanted after they finish blooming. For control of diseases and insects—aphids in particular—it is good gardening to shift the planting every year or two. But if 'mums are to follow 'mums, the gardener can at least make sure of a pile of organic matter that will be decaying over winter and that can be turned under when the plants are divided and replanted in spring. 'Mums, better than almost any other garden favorite will thrive on freshly spaded and heavily composted soil.

Garden Club Outlook for 1943 Is None Too Encouraging

By Katherine Barrett Pozer

What of our gardening and garden club activities for next year? We soon will have our own gardens safely put to bed for the winter and will have time to look around and consider just what lies ahead for the garden-minded. What we see is not very encouraging but has interesting possibilities. By this time most of us have realized that next year's vegetable gardens are not going to be just pleasant wartime gestures but that these small, amateur-cared-for, gardens are going to be desperately needed to help fill the shortage of farm labor.

Those of us who have land suitable for growing vegetables have a real responsibility to plan to supply our needs not only for a few weeks in midsummer but through careful planting and planning to have ample vegetables for the entire year. Those of us who do not have suitable land have the responsibility of making our own garden spots as attractive as possible with little maintenance and plan to use our gardening knowledge to the fullest by assisting groups who are planning for community or school gardens where we can act as advisers or supervisors. Certain it is that all of us, both old and young, will have added responsibilities during next year and with perhaps increasing tempo in the years to follow.

Never More Important

The organization of garden clubs has never been more important. Gone are the pleasant hours when over a cup of tea we could consider only the flowers of our choice and our pet neighborhood project. We have had years of training in things which will be most essential to the war effort. We have the set-up and trained workers for important phases of war work. We can in the more rural communities place our organization and its members at the disposal of the agencies in the counties which are trying to spur on the next years victory garden program, and through the Red Cross and other military camp agencies make definite plans and schedules for placing flowers in the wards and for a succession of dish gardens and terrariums.

At this season we have a special privilege of helping to make the hospitals wards gay at our nearby camps. The enthusiastic welcome of those who helped decorate the wards at Belvoir and other camps last year has made all members of the committees want to serve again. One was proud of the garden clubs as they arrived in the bitter cold weather just before the holidays. The wreaths they brought were as fine as any seen at the Christmas greens exhibits of recent years. The small trees were gay and lovely and the other decorations for dining tables and special places were attractive and varied. It is not only the patients in this our new war who must be remembered, but the patients of the last war who since 1918 have faced long dreary years of hospitalization. There are also the other ill and shut-ins and the inmates of our varied institutions.

Surprising Proposal

When one considers the possibilities of work waiting to be done by garden clubs—work which they alone have the training and organization to do—it seems surprising that one hears that some clubs are considering disbanding. A recent issue of Horticulture says that it is "pathetic" that some clubs are considering disbanding and gives some of the many reasons for the continuation of their efforts. They quote a letter from a captain in one of the large Eastern camps. "I would greatly appreciate it if some way were found for some type of indoor gardening. While this would not have the appeal to the same number of patients as the outdoor variety, there are always a number of patients capable of taking interest in such occupations and this project would be an additional aid in fighting off the monotony of hospital existence."

The military hospitals give an added challenge to the garden clubs of America. The years of gardening and the making of arrangements has given them experience which with a little ingenuity can be translated into things suitable for military hospital needs. At the same time this training makes them valued members of communities who are planning community gardens or trying to increase the amount of produce from victory gardens. It is not only in the growing of edibles that the garden clubs can be of use, but they can make a study of the canning and storage of vegetables so that none will be wasted. Possibilities of very essential work are unending.

BRIDGE

BY MARIAN BARRE

No prophet arose in bridgedom!—and hence it came to pass that the unexpected happened when the annual District Championships opened November 13 at the Shoreham. What was to be a cozy local tournament for the home folk, a short respite from wartime toil, turned out to be an almost regional bridge event, attracting talent from all the nearby States. With the minimum of advertising and no effort at outside promotion, the twelfth annual beat the record of many peacetime tourneys. Enforced abstinence from master-point competition has whetted appetites.

The curtain-raising events for men's and women's pairs produced fields of surprising "alien" strength. Washington split these titles with Virginia. Winners of the Columbia Trophy were our Mrs. W. Scott Athey, alias "Jimmy," and Mrs. J. E. (Emily) Folline of Richmond. The ever-dependable "Old Master" of the Washington Bridge League, Leroy Thurtell, and his crony, R. L. Miles, jr. of Norfolk captured the President's Cup. This latter trophy is only two years old and during Miles' tenure it goes abroad for the first time. The Columbia takes its second journey in a whole decade of play, Mrs. Folline having won it before in 1939 with Mrs. Rosenbloom, also of Richmond.

Mrs. Irene Surguy and Tom Hamlin won the only all-local victory when they annexed the Capital Cup for mixed pairs; naturally it was the most popular result in the tournament. Both players are members of the leading team in the Federal Bridge League and Mrs. Surguy is one of the foremost tournament gals. Hamlin, like Thurtell, is a charter member of the Bridge League and he belongs to the old "Shoreham gang" which has dominated bridge in the Capital, for our first experts were no mere flashes in the pan but stars, constant as Sirius.

The real traveler among District trophies is the gorgeous Woodward Cup, which goes abroad again, this time in the custody of Lieut. Herbert Gerst of the Naval Operating Base in Norfolk, and N. G. Wilson, jr. of the same town. Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Lemon, who made the best local showing in the open championship, finished third, less than two points off top. With a 5-point spread from first to fifth the opens was anybody's game, up to the last card.

George Kathan, president of the Federal Bridge League, and R. F. Thurrell, a rising young star who hailed from Boston, were easy winners in Metropolitan pairs, leading the first round and finishing with a 12½-point margin over Dr. and Mrs. C. B. Custis. "Pickings" were richer in this game than any other for the new intermediate champs acquire the Evening Star trophy, $25 war bonds, and they secure the club plaque for their organization. There was no outside competition in the metropolitan, most visiting players rank as masters.

A non-championship event on Saturday was won by Dr. and Mrs. A. J. Steinberg, Washington, and the "consolation" section of the opens went to Mrs. Ruth Kavanaugh of this city and Joseph Grinsfelder, Baltimore. Pairs failing to qualify for the opens furnished one of the high spots of the tournaments. Among the eliminated experts were Mesdames Folline and Athey, St. Aubin and Kavanaugh and Poulieff and Long. The men included J. B. Stone, W. de St. Aubin, and the Baltimore duo of Hunter-Schlessinger. There were many other upsets in this field.

Runners-up to the champions were: Mrs. Frederick Eberson, Pittsburgh, and Mrs. Kavanaugh, in the women's; C. B. Austin and John Dorsey, both of Washington, in men's pairs; Mr. and Mrs. Lemon, our ranking marital partnership, ran second to Surguy and Hamlin; Mrs. Edward Behrend and Sergt. Edward Pierson, Baltimore, lost the opens by less than one match point; Dr. and Mrs. C. B. Custis of Washington, surged up in the Metropolitan finals, ousting Mrs. Helen Palmer and G. L. Dickerson from second place. The Custis team is good.

Going into the tournament with two titles the Lemons lost both, nevertheless they made an excellent record, for besides the runner-up spot they were third in the opens and qualified second in the preliminary round. Mrs. Eberson also gave a classy performance, showing in every event. With R. A. Owen of Lynchburg, she finished fifth in the mixed, and qualified top in her section on Sunday afternoon.

Among the visiting celebrities not previously mentioned in this report was superexpert Charles H. Goren, of Philadelphia, winner of 42 championships and twice selected as the leading American player. He competed only in the mixed event, finishing sixth with Mrs. H. C. White of Washington. The B. M. Golders, Pvt. Charles Solomon, and Mrs. "Peggy" Wood, all of Philadelphia, also attended. Mrs. Golder and Solomon were fourth in the open championship, with a 2-point lead over Capt. and Mrs. R. H. Skinner of Chestnut Hills, Mass. It was Mrs. Skinner's first visit here since she was Eve Latter.

Servicemen attending the tournament merely happened to be stationed nearby. Not all were so fortunate. Among the missing were two defending champs, Lieutenant Watson, now in Florida, and Alvin Roth, in Newark, under assignment from the War Department. Captain Conolly missed a District Tournament for the first time, his present whereabouts being unknown. Pvt. W. W. McIntyre on November 13 was ordered to proceed by plane to Mobile, Ala., and thus "Mac" "stood up" two partners. Pvt. Oscar Brotman is using other signals than the "preferential discard" at Camp Monmouth.

With a closing bouquet—this time for the management—we salute P. E. Henninger, president of the Washington Bridge League, Director Paul E. Golden and Guest Director Capt. Russell Baldwin, ballistic expert and master of "decisions." It was a swell tournament you put on!

Thirty days hath November—which brings the Federal League's November open contest as early as the twenty-fourth — this coming Tuesday—and of course, the place is Wardman Park. The game is open to the general public, without strings, even nondefense workers may play. Each member of the winning duo receives one master point, plus a prize.

Tomorrow the women's auxiliary tries out its new day for the charity game, which is for the benefit of Chinese Relief. Admission costs only 50 cents and all proceeds are donated to the cause; the general public is invited to attend. Come early and receive the match point bonus for prompt pairs—8 p. m. is the official starting time. The place is the Stephan Studios, at 1355 Euclid Street Northwest.

What may be the Auxiliary's last intra-organization prize was shared by three members playing in the Washington Bridge League tournament. They were Former President Mrs. D. E. Stephen, Assistant Secretary Mrs. C. W. Zimmer, and Mrs. William Tidball, staunchest supporting member of the benefit games. These ladies received free tournament fees as a season prize, their scores paralleling so closely it was impossible to determine a single winner.

In the future the association may abolish even this minor expense in order to fatten the "Cause of the Month."

In the Federal Bridge League's team match of November 17 the "Mixed Party" foursome of Buckley, Stein, Ehringer and Richards, won section "A" for the second successive time, winning 16 out of 24 matches. The north-south pair of the team had top score of 103 match points, Mr. and Mrs. Hamlin of the still-unnamed Hamlin line-up, won east-west with 100 points.

The "Vains" were invincible in section B, winning 18½ out of 24 boards, and capturing both pair prizes, Mesdames Golden, Grewe, Rothwell and McEnery form the Vains. The Golden-Grewe north-south top was 111 match points while the other partnership scored 99½ among the east-west pairs.

Section C also played 24 matches, the winners here were the "Grand Slam" team of Banda, Schmidt, Worcester and Rhodes. The team split pair tops with the "Four M's," Worcester and Rhodes leading east-west with 71½ match points, which percentage was beaten by the north-south pair, having 74½. It was a repeat triumph for the M's, whose two new members won their first game, played on November 10. The high-powered ladies are Mrs. Roy Baker and Mrs. H. Holcombe. Two straight wins in a new field deserves complete identification instead of partial anonymity. Since entrance slips often are made out in a casual manner it was decided to use only surnames, regardless of sex, in reporting the Federal Bridge League.

An example of the nice playing technique of the Boston champions is presented in today's hand. The declarer was Frank Perkins, who made his game contract by developing a side suit before pulling trumps, and by managing his entry problem smartly.

Declarer trumped the second diamond lead and saw that game hinged upon winning a heart trick. A spade was led to dummy's king, and a heart was led and the jack finessed, losing to West's queen. Another diamond was led and ruffed by South. A low trump put dummy in with the queen, and another heart was played. When East turned up with the ace, four spades was sure. A diamond could be ruffed in dummy and any other return allowed Perkins to draw spades and take his good side tricks.

Spades should not be drawn before the heart suit is developed, for declarer may lose the lead twice, and diamond leads will shorten his trumps so that he will lose control.

Perkins made four spades, losing a diamond and two hearts.

OUTDOOR WASHINGTON

By Jack Kearney

For the first time in my life last Monday I built a bird feeding station in my backyard. It's not much to look at. In fact, you may even laugh when I tell you what I made it out of. But I am quite a novice at this sort of thing, and I'm quite pleased at the results I've been getting.

A search of my cellar, backyard, and attic revealed that I had practically nothing to build it with. But I was in such an enthusiastic mood that I was determined to do the best with the material at hand.

The finished product, I'm sure, represents something new in bird feeding stations.

Materials I built it from were: a top of one of those large lard cans with holes punched in it for drainage; a pie-plate, and an old dust-mop handle, the kind with the knob in the middle.

I punched a hole in the center of the lard-can top large enough to slide it down over the handle to the knob. Atop the handle I nailed the pie-plate. So the inverted top, and the pie-plate serve as trays. I then nailed the handle to the back steps bannister.

In both trays I liberally sprinkled some wild bird seed, which can be bought at most pet shops for 10 cents or less a pound. A pound usually lasts a week.

Although I had heard stories about it taking several days for the birds to find the food, I am happy to report that it only took about two hours for three tufted titmice to visit my station. The little birds, noted for their curiosity, probably came, at first, just to see what the peculiar looking object was. They must have liked it though, because they have been coming back every day.

Added to the list of boarders since then are a male and a female cardinal, a flock of English sparrows, and five or six starlings. One day some squirrels feasted there.

A military slant to nature is given under the heading, "Bird Study and the War." by George A. Petrides, junior park naturalist of the National Capital Parks Service, in a pamphlet he has just completed.

He says, "In wartime, some persons consider such activities as bird study inappropriate. On the contrary, window-sill feeding stations and other bird studies provide just the recreational uplift needed by persons working long hours or those worried by personal or world situations. Few recreational activities permit such perfect, natural relaxation for the whole family.

"Bird students that follow their hobby further into the field derive additional benefits to health from walking and from using their eyes for other than close work. Such practical wartime benefits as increased physical endurance, development of stalking abilities, knowledge of natural camouflage, poisonous plants and edible fruits is gained. The ability to immediately locate and focus upon a small moving object within the field of binoculars (a trick not appreciated until attempted in a dense leafy woods or an open sky) and a wider appreciation of the natural attractions of our country is acquired. Who can say that these qualities are of no value in a soldier, civilian defense worker, or a war agency employe?"

Petrides' pamphlet, entitled "Attracting Birds to Your Home," will be published in a few weeks. The pamphlet will deal mostly with bird feeding stations.

Following is a list of activities scheduled for this week: Further information may be had by calling REpublic 1820, Ext. 2557. For bus and streetcar information call MIchigan 6363, Ext. 613.

Grandmaster Reuben Fine, currently leading the Washington Chess Divan's championship fray, will give a simultaneous exhibition on Wednesday evening at that club's quarters in the Parkside Hotel. The exhibition will be the first that Fine has given here since his memorable record-breaking 110-board feat staged at the National Press Club last May, under the joint sponsorship of the Divan, Capital City, and Federal Clubs. The public is invited to witness the play, or to participate against the master at a cost of $1 per board.

Round five of the Divan's championship tourney saw H. A. Rousseau beat W. E. Napier, while M. C. Stark and A. Mengarini adjourned, V. L. Eaton and A. W. Fox did likewise, and L. N. Ponce and Fine postponed. Napier has had his adjourned game with Fox forfeited to the latter. The standings:

Stoegerer, and Loeb, drew with Lyman, but lost to Miss M. G. Sewall and J. S. Carpenter. Loeb won from Lyman, Carpenter and F. J. Hermann. Lyman scored over Lewis, Hermann, and E. W. Tarlan, while Carpenter conquered H. Dalland, Stoegerer and Hermann. After Miss Sewall lost to Tarlan, and Brimmer drew with Dalland, the standings were:

Reily won the play-off with 1½ points, Stark getting 1, and Green ½.

Capital City Chess Club recently awarded the William S. Sullivan Memorial Membership, which yields a year's membership in the club to the local high school players of outstanding ability, to John R. Rast of Roosevelt and James Heidenreich of Eastern. The G. H. Parks Membership award, on a similar basis, was given to Raymond G. Burrington of Central and John R. Perry of Wilson.

Federal Chess Club last Wednesday tendered its testimonial banquet to club founder Dr. Arnold Steinbach, and staged a simultaneous exhibition by chessmaster Horowitz, Chess Review editor. Play in the club championship tournaments found C. Karson drawing with E. Skraly, while L. Korstrom beat F. R. Mueller in section 1. Mueller was erroneously reported as beating H. Steinbach, with whom he actually drew. In section 2, Harold Burdge defeated J. Richman, while M. R. Paul won from Edmund Nash. The standings:

Section 1	W	L	Section 2	W	L
Karson	3½	½	Paul	3	0
Korstrom	2	1	Burdge	2	0

Pottle defeated C. J. Wright.

STAMP NEWS

The official publication of the Postoffice Department entitled "A Description of United States Postage Stamps" is now ready for distribution. It contains a foreword by Postmaster General Frank C. Walker. All of the United States stamps since 1847 through the 3-cent "Win the War" and 5-cent China commemorative stamps are illustrated and fully described. There are also several pages of interesting detail of figures of stamps issued as per quantities and other facts of value to all collectors. The book is in one binding, paper covers, and sells for 30 cents rather than for 25 as at first announced. The only way copies may be obtained is to send remittance to the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office. No copies will be made available at the Postoffice Department or its several bureaus.

New designs are still being considered by Postoffice Department officials and an announcement may be forthcoming shortly. The 6-cent air mail stamps are being sold in greater quantities than ever before and those in the armed services use this stamp rather than the frank to which all soldiers are entitled. At this time matters are being considered concerning this stamp that may prove very interesting when and if announced. The Philatelic Agency on the sixth floor of the Department building is carrying on as usual in spite of the false rumors. The Exhibition Room, more popular than ever, will soon be in new quarters in the Library on the first floor. Some of the features now on exhibition will be eliminated for the duration but the exhibition so far as the stamps are concerned will be in operation as usual.

As is the annual custom the Postoffice Department will allow "Christmas" stamps and other labels to be placed on the back of articles and first-class mail matter for international mails from November 15 to January 15, 1943, due to the holidays. The usual restrictions against such labels on domestic mail will be suspended from December 1 to January 1.

The usual procedure for the use of precanceled stamps for the holidays will be in operation this year at first, second and third class postoffices. Such stamps will be affixed by postal employes and not given to the person presenting parcels for mailing. The stamps are not to be precanceled by the ordinary canceling devices, but only with special equipment furnished for that purpose which prints the name of the postoffice between two heavy parallel lines. This general authority for precancels is for December only. Postmasters have been cautioned to prevent the misuse of such precanceled stamps.

During September only two postage stamp plate numbers were issued at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, both for the 3-cent "Win the War" stamp, 1942 series, subject 400 curved, electric eye convertible, Nos. 22971 and 22972. In September there were sent to press only six plates as follows, all of stamps of the 1938 series: 2-cent, September 9, 22894 and 22895; 3-cent, September 25, 22910 and 22911, and 8-cent, September 4, 22839 and 22,840. In October there were sent to press six plate numbers, all of the 3-cent "Win the War" stamp, as follows: October 2, 22961 and 22962; October 28, 22965 and 22966, and October 31, 22967 and 22968. No postage stamp plate numbers were issued in October.

Philatelic Notes

Philatelic meetings scheduled for the week are as follows: Tomorrow evening, Capital Precancel Club, Thomson Community Center and Woodridge Stamp Club, at residence of Mrs. Hickerson, 3102 Twenty-fourth Street Northeast, and Tuesday evening, Collectors Club, Branch 5, S. P. A., Thomson Community Center, Twelfth and L Streets Northwest.

At the meeting of the Collectors Club, Branch 5, S. P. A., on Tuesday evening at the Thomson Community Center, Alexander Halperson exhibited the stamps of Bulgaria. All pages in the Halperson collection are highly illuminated and, with a showing of mint issues, the effect is most pleasing. Mr. Vaughan presided and presented a number of applications for membership. At Thursday's meeting there will be an auction sale and P. C. Nahl will be the speaker. The announcement was made that the annual Christmas party will be held Tuesday, December 22, when a special program will be provided and an admission of donations of food, clothing, etc., will be solicited on behalf of the Community Center.

At the auction sale of the Dead Letter Office held at the Thomson Community Center on November 10, in connection with the meetings of the Collectors Club, $560 was realized.

The Progressive Philatelic Society of Chicago, Ill., is again carrying on its work among the shutins and for the Christmas season has issued seals for the benefit of this work. The seals are sold for 10 cents for 6, and postage, and may be obtained from Mrs. Alice C. Westphal, 3008 N. Whipple Street, Chicago, Ill.

The Stamp Club of the Buchanan School has organized for the present term with Nick Karayianir president; Fred Rochelli, vice president, and Billy Atchison, secretary. The club meets every Friday afternoon with Mrs. Miram C. Henricksen in her classroom, she being the supervisor of the club. Several members of the club have collections that are unusually good for junior collectors. Later in the year an exhibition will probably be held and awards made for the best collections displayed.

The Washington Air Mail Society met on Monday evening at the home of its secretary, Miss Alice B. Cilley, 119 Ninth Street Northeast. Miss Cilley's large collection of covers, air mails and baggage labels was exhibited and caused much favorable comment. A general discussion of current events took place and during the evening Miss Cilley served an excellent repast. At the December meeting to be held on Monday, December 21, at the Thomson Community Center, the annual election will be held.

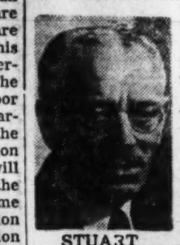
R. C. Southard, president of the Capital Precancel Club, has issued a call for all members to be present at the meeting to be held tomorrow evening at the Thomson Community Center. Several matters of vital importance to the club will be discussed and acted upon and every member is especially asked to attend.

At the meeting of the Woodridge Stamp Club at the Taft School on Monday evening Major Brewrink spoke on "How to Accumulate Precancels." The club will meet tomorrow evening at the home of its president and an urgent call has been sent out for all members to attend.

The Washington Philatelist

By William M. Stuart

The war has brought about many changes in the economic life of the Nation but stamp collecting is still considered one of the necessary recreations.



STUART

Rumors now in circulation that the Philatelic Agency is to be discontinued are causing much annoyance to officials of the Postoffice Department. These rumors are absolutely untrue and have been denied repeatedly. The agency has been in operation since 1921, rendering real service to stamp collectors the world over. Necessary curtailment of space in the Postoffice Department building certainly does not proclaim the abandonment of any activity. Sales at present fully justify the continuance of the agency, which has always been self-supporting, and the fact that new stamps are not being issued at this time in great numbers is no indication that the agency is to be abandoned.

In this connection it is interesting to note what Postmaster General Walker has to say about the agency at this time: "The Philatelic Agency of the Postoffice Department, during the past 20 years, has rendered a very valuable and useful service to the stamp collectors of the Nation. In the years to come, I am sure that stamp collectors will continue to utilize the facilities of the agency as a means of obtaining selected stock for their philatelic collections."

New Issues

Australia has issued two new stamps. Both stamps are of the same denomination, 5½-penny. One stamp is a small horizontal, showing the value overprinted on the 5-penny, this design showing a merino sheep, with the background a barren waste. The color is purple. The other stamp is vertical, dark blue and shows an emu, the large bird that looks like an ostrich.

Curacao has a new issue of 15 air mail stamps, 12 already having been in use. Regular postage denominations also have been issued and for the first time the stamps have been printed in London by the recess process. Lieut. Col. de Blieck of the Netherlands colonial office designed the series. The regular issue numbers six stamps. The air mail stamps thus far received are as follows: 10-cent, 35-cent and 70-cent, show a plane in flight between tween Curacao and the Netherlands; the 15-cent, 40-cent and 1.40-gulden illustrate a plane flying over the islands; the 25-cent, 50-cent and 5-gulden show a bimotored Douglas plane of the Dutch Air Lines, and the 30-cent, 60-cent and the 10-gulden depict a plane landing on an airfield in Curacao. The stamps issued show the denomination as "cent" and not "cents."

Egypt reports several new stamps. The denominations are said to be 6 milliemes, 15 milliemes and 20 milliemes. The stamps will commemorate the millennial anniversary of the Mohammedan seat of learning, the Mosque of El Azhar at Cairo.

Spain has a new stamp. Evidently it is the first of a new series in the making. It bears a portrait of General Franco, engraved, and in brown, the denomination being 40 centimos.

Turkey has issued a series of eight child-welfare stamps, the values being 20 paras, 1 kurkus, 2½ kurkus, 3 kurkus, 5 kurkus, 10 kurkus, 15 kurkus and 25 kurkus.

A WEEKEND REVIEW OF CURRENT PUBLICATIONS

Time Of Their Lives

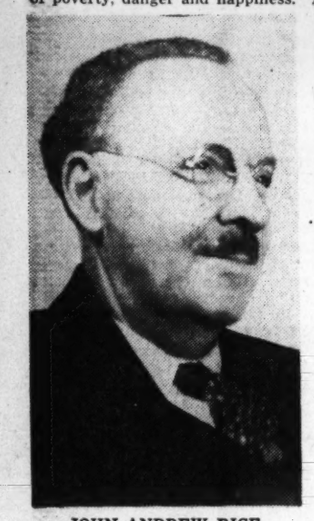
By Katherine de M. Hoskins

ZORA HURSTON'S exuberant, appealing and slipshod autobiography tells how one person grew up through the crust of the masses and bloomed brightly and to good effect. She was never a flower to blush unseen, a state which in itself implies something of a sufficiency—the Miller of Dee, for instance, probably did a good business. Where she came from there was no alternative between explosion into the upper world and a flowerless life of drudgery and monotony. She has made her name as an anthropologist. This book gives reasons why she has probably made an even more valuable name as a friend and personality. In all autobiography, one looks for some richness, some wisdom from the living of a full and worthy life. One finds them here only in an indomitable zest for work and enjoyment of life; yet one welcomes the tiger lily in the upland pastures and does not ask that it have the varying shades, the fragrance or therapeutic qualities of Valerian.

At the other pole in background, sensibilities and aims, Siegfried Sassoon's latest addition to his many memoired career is barren of wisdom or vitality as an aspidistra. The names of Edmond Gosse, Rupert Brooke and Ralph Hodgson, together with mellow reflections on the Russian ballet, hunting, sunsets and the flight of swallows lie around like colored pebbles in an arrangement that gets what charm it has from being of the past, rather than of youth.

"Martha Washington" and "Second Sowing" deal with two remarkable American women. The first is a name known to all children and this story of her life should appeal even to the quite young. It is told quietly and with considerable detail and the bibliography suggests accuracy.

But Mary Aloysia Hardey is a name almost unknown except in the specialized history of the modern Catholic Church and its religious order. Mary Williams has bound the life of Mother Hardey with an account of the founding and progress of the Order of the Sacred Heart and has made of both an interesting and often moving recital of poverty, danger and happiness. Her ability has been great to extract from what is often and unavoidably a chronicle of events, an evocation of sweetness and courage. And it took much of both qualities to extend the faith in Louisiana during the early and middle years of the last century. Travel was uncertain and dangerous, diseases many and deadly. Yet they found a welcome from the Catholics lost there in the wilderness and a reason for their exertions in their ignorance; an ignorance that could allow the Catholics of one settlement to perform a curious inversion of history and adorn their church with pictures of Venus and Bacchus. Miss Williams' speaks often of the children and their games, the cheer and decorum of convent life and above all the singing, by these coiffed pioneers. It makes one glad that not everywhere was the Mediaeval springtime that hangs like a millefleurs tapestry with saints and pious animals at the back of all our minds replaced by the Genevan winter where seagulls come to snatch dry bread.



JOHN ANDREW RICE
Refugee from the eighteenth century

THE PRESIDING genius of Mr. John Andrew Rice's autobiography is his gift for penetrating and concise remarks. And if only for some of these that provide deep if narrow shafts into American folkways, it is worth reading.

Though he is frank enough about the personalities that surrounded him as a child, Mr. Rice grows more reticent when he treats his manhood. Reticence is to his credit as a person, but it has not been a quality of the great autobiographers. Perhaps a novel would have offered a happier solution—Mr. Rice has the wit for one and a zest for people.

Hitler And The German Generals

How Their Supposed Puppet Has Become Their Destroyer

The Progress Of Militarism Since Versailles

By Robert E. Runser

WHEN IMPERIAL GERMANY disappeared from history as the consequence of military defeat and internal revolution, there were, even then, many Germans who utterly refused to admit that their armies had been beaten in the field. The war, they insisted, was lost by the radicals, cowards and traitors on the home front. Out of this rather illogical conviction grew the legend of "the stab in the back." The officer class in particular found great solace in this legend, and it was they who nurtured it. And out of the legend grew the desire to right the legendary wrong, to prove that, given an equally favorable opportunity, what happened in 1918 could never happen again.

Mr. Curt Riess tells us how this desire to erase "the shame of 1918," wrought the destruction of those who cherished it, namely the German generals. Not all German generals are Prussians, but the preponderance of Prussians in all the higher ranks of the army has given a character to the whole military system. If the defeat rankled the military caste in general, it literally devoured the souls of the Prussians, to whom war and planning for war were the all-in-all of existence. Their motto might have been that of Gloucester: "From that bloody torment I will free myself, or hew my way out with a bloody axe." Deprived of their vocation and livelihood by the Treaty of Versailles they began immediately to plot and plan, to save and scrape with the idea of creating another military machine that would be absolutely irresistible.

MEANS to gratify the ambition were not as hard to find as might have been supposed. Of course, it took work and plenty of work. First of all everything had to be done clandestinely for there were international commissions in Germany to watch out for violations of the military provisions of the treaty. The general staff, outlawed by the treaty, became the seemingly innocuous Allgemeine Truppenampt. In like ways other military institutions and customs assumed the mask of innocence.

Gen. Hans von Seeckt, almost the peer of Ludendorff or Hoffman in ability, was in charge of organizing the new army. By the creation of "temporary volunteers" he made possible a cadre army that, as events proved, could be turned overnight into a powerful fighting mechanism. Ostensibly the Germans had renounced the concept of the levee en masse and were concentrating on a small specialized army, but only ostensibly. The Reichswehr grew and at the same time, behind the scenes, the "Black Reichswehr," organized and trained men, gathered supplies and made contacts with influential people. Seeckt carefully sorted his key men from the remnant of the broken Imperial army and built his machine with that precision of detail which will preserve his fame among professional military men everywhere. When it was impossible to train enough technicians openly without attracting suspicion, a treaty was concluded with Russia whereby men could be trained there. Military scholars poured through the histories of wars and campaigns in the Reichsarchiv. New weapons were planted and developed. The tank and the airplane received special consideration. Although the Prussians searched the past for the lessons of war, they looked to the future for its instruments.

The generals, however, lacked one important tool for their purpose. They needed a leader; a man who could carry their plans to the people and so make their desire for a powerfully armed Germany also the national desire. Although the Prussians could plan and make and wage wars, they could not, neither as a class nor as individuals, approach the people. There were several reasons why this was so. In the first place the Prussian militarists have no particular love for the people, as such, nor the people for them. They were especially anxious not to revive the reproaches which in 1918 had been heaped upon them for all the sufferings and hardships of the war years. How badly they needed a popular leader to win over the masses can be seen in their several unsuccessful attempts to wrest control of the state from the hands of the civilian and pacifist Republican government.

Woefully enough, for the world and for the generals themselves, a new theory of state was then being hatched in the mind of a former German corporal. The fates determined that Hitler's desires and the desires of the generals should be fused. In thus selling their hopes and labors to a fanatical demagogue, to a low-born, ignorant, vulgar fellow, whose private personality few of them could stomach, the Prussian generals also sold their birthright. The cunning Hitler soon saw to it that the Reichswehr belonged neither to the Prussians, nor to the people, but to Hitler. By seeking to make Hitler the tool of their purposes the generals became the tools of Hitler's purposes, though to us one set of purposes may seem as black as the other. Nevertheless, there were many fundamental matters which the generals did not see eye-to-eye with the Nazis.

But those generals who were foolish enough to say so, were quickly purged. At the same time the remaining generals were granted concessions and given promises. After Hitler came into power, they had unlimited opportunity to plan and devise, and this, after so many years of penniless grubbing, was fairly close to the Prussian idea of paradise.

GENERAL HANS von SEECKT
The man who rebuilt the German war machine from the wreckage of the Imperial army

NATURALLY ENOUGH, after they had worked long enough, the generals began to think about trying out their new army in a nice short war—short because they knew they were hardly ready as yet for anything like a repetition of the Great War. Hitler seemed to be thinking in the same terms. So when Austria was ripe for the plucking, the show was offered to the army. Elaborate plans were drawn for this invasion and the new German army marched in high spirits to the Austrian border—only to find that they were just a part of a huge parade. Hitler had stolen the show by a political coup. The generals were cheated again in Czecho-Slovakia.

But in 1939, when the German army was poised at the frontiers of Poland for the thrust which would open the eyes of the world, the generals, at least those of the old guard, believed that they were at the threshold of success. This was to be the short war, the campaign, which would put the Army back into the seats of power. In less than a month, Poland was prostrate and Germany, admittedly, had the greatest and best military machine in the world.

But what of the generals? Instead of a short war, they found themselves involved in a series of interminable campaigns. Hitler's political desires and theirs, once so nearly identical, split at this point. The generals wanted to quit because they knew how ill prepared they were for a long war. Hitler wanted to go on, and so, instead of peace and glory, came the terrible succession of pyrrhic victories: Denmark and Norway, Luxembourg, Holland and Belgium, France, Yugoslavia and Greece. Too late the generals saw how the cloth was cut. The pattern was the same they had followed to ruin from 1914 to 1918. They faced a continual warfare on many fronts, but the worst was yet to come.

ONE FEAR which froze the hearts of the generals, as of so many generals before them, came whenever they envisaged the open plains of Russia. Too well they realized the terrific risks that a campaign against Moscow must involve. They had studied and restudied such a possibility and always reaching the conclusion that it was far wiser to keep Russia a neutral, or if possible, to make her an ally. They had less faith than some of our own military experts in the "knife through butter" theory of a Russo-German war. When Hitler and Stalin signed a treaty in August, 1939, the generals sighed with relief and buried their plans in their file cabinets. But at the close of the Balkan campaign, Hitler suddenly proposed that Russia be attacked.

In vain the generals argued and protested. The Russian campaign was planned as a sort of super blitzkrieg. It had to be that because of the Russian winter. And indeed the plan almost worked. Within two months the Germans had reached the Stalin Line. They had made spectacular progress but their schedules demanded even more progress. By first of October, the Russians had been pushed back to the Taganrog-Kharkov line and to the Don. But, alas, winter had already set in and the blitzkrieg was at an end. The campaign, in reality, was already lost.

THUS HITLER has been the Frankenstein's monster of the generals. If by some miracle they can pull themselves out of their present unhappy predicament, and can overcome the pressures being applied on all the battlefronts of the world, not they but Hitler will be acclaimed as the savior of the German race, and the generals know it.

They also know, too well, that if they lose the war the German people will not let them off as easily as last time. They hate Hitler less for what he is than for what he has done to them. The SS and the Party have burrowed so deeply into the framework of the whole army that the generals can no longer count upon the unqualified loyalty of their troops. The "Nazi generals" are now at least as powerful and numerous as those of the Prussian old guard. A march on Berlin is highly improbable, because, among other reasons, SS troops, well trained in the ways of civil war, could rout any field army which might overcome scruples about fighting against the Fuehrer and Fatherland. The alternative of selling out to the enemy, as the Prussian York von Wartenburg sold out to Napoleon's enemies, is equally improbable. Whatever his vices, the modern Prussian is incapable of such an action. In short the generals are doomed and know it, but like tragic heroes they are playing out the last act because there is nothing else they can do.

"The Self-Betrayed" is a book which deserves both praise and careful, critical study. It is an informative chronicle of German militarism and rearmament during the 20 years of peace. Mr. Riess' main thesis that Prussian militarism has wrought its own destruction, while highly dramatic, is perhaps less important than his presentation of this not too well known period of German military history. The book provides an excellent introduction to the many military personages who dominated events in post-war Germany before the rise of Hitler and of those who dominate now. The book suffers, however, from Mr. Riess' habit of spicing his text with extraneous gossip. And in the absence of documentation questions of authenticity are raised by the elaborately circumstantial accounts of secret conferences, especially military conferences.

Is Pacifism To Blame For The War?

"WORLD IN TRANCE," by Leopold Schwarzschild. (Fischer, $3.50.)

THIS BOOK by the German journalist, Leopold Schwarzschild, is new neither in its concept nor in its ideas. Most of us have read the history of the Treaty of Versailles and its aftermath and are familiar with the thesis that Wilson's idealism and pacifistic tendencies were the real causes of the present war.

This entire genus of books is important only insofar as they repeat the story of the politics of the past quarter century for the confessed purpose of influencing our future actions. Schwarzschild's contribution seems more authoritative than others because he is a German, a man who has lived through all of it on the other side of the fence, and is now ready to testify that the German people are not trustworthy.

His book, however, is remarkable less for what it contains than for what it leaves out. "World in Trance," with its subtitle: "From Versailles to Pearl Harbor," devotes 220 pages to the period from 1918 to 1923, 140 pages to developments between 1924 and 1935, but only 45 pages to the years between 1935 and 1941. In his description of the peace negotiations in Paris Schwarzschild stresses the stubbornness with which Wilson fought for his ideas of a new world, for peace without vengeance. But the author neglects to make clear that Wilson lost his fight to Clemenceau whose action was only insufficiently offset by Wilson's pacifistic intransigeance and by Lloyd George's insistence upon the "balance of power." Schwarzschild tells in page after page of the frantic efforts of peace-minded majorities in the Anglo-Saxon countries and in France, too, but he neglects to point to the fact that their efforts never influenced actual policy.

The basic difference between pacifism, which tries to eradicate the causes of war, and appeasement, which compromises with them, does not occur to the author. In his history of the last 25 years of European action, which covers some 400 pages, the mere existence, let alone the paramount historical importance, of Soviet Russia is scarcely mentioned.

The thesis of the book is open to attack insofar, too, as it bases the global conflict of today on the age-old antagonism between France and Germany. This is a recurring fallacy among European thinkers, who tend to limit their historical perspectives entirely to the Western World, without any regard to the factors of the East, or of the world as a whole.

Americans still look upon the world as a place to be improved, a laboratory of perfectionism. The notion of a Prussian militarism offered to them for their own "protection" against the "evil German soul," is something happily alien to their traditions and psychology.

KURT KELMAN.

Anglo-Baltimorean

By John T. Appleby

"THOROFARE," says Christopher Morley, "was written slowly, and should be read the same way. It is really an adventure in international understanding, this account of the Americanization of an English boy. Geoffey Barton spent the early part of his boyhood in the peaceful old town of Wilford, which narrowly escapes being a second Cranford in Mr. Morley's sympathetic and nostalgic portrayal. He lived with his aunts, and his life was that of the ordinary middle-class child in a sleepy little town.

Uncle Dan had broken away from the old country and gone to America, where he taught English literature at Patapsco College in Chesapeake. He returned to Wilford and then brought young Geoffrey and Aunt back to Chesapeake with him. Chesapeake is a very thinly disguised Baltimore, a city toward which I entertain the very tenderest affections, an idyllic city whose fortunate inhabitants may sit at their ease in cool old taverns or restful gardens and sip mulled wine, a gourmet's paradise where one may feed on viands rich and rare, a port whose waterside would lure Haroun el-Raschid from the streets of Bagdad.

In the Baltimore of the 1900's, a city celebrated in the annals of H. L. Mencken, young Geoffrey spent his boyhood and grew into an American citizen, clinging, as he should, to his memories of England, and yet fully aware of the American tradition, particularly as exemplified by Major Warren, a veteran of the War Between the States, who, in that effort to be even more Southern than Robert E. Lee or Jefferson Davis which seems to be typical of the inhabitants of Baltimore, a race given to swooning at the strains of "Dixie," indulged in "we-all's," dropped g's, and elided r's galore.

Of story there is little; of conversation learned, witty, and tender there is much. This is a book to delight the heart of the leisurely reader who loves literature for its own sake, who will appreciate the Vergilian quotations of Lightfoot, the major's servant, who will relish Aunt Bee's acid comments, and who will follow Uncle Dan in the wildest flights.

"Thorofare" is Christopher Morley at his whimsical, gentle, and slightly Rabelasian best, and at his best he is one of what the late Charles J. Finger called the Great Companions.

ELLIOT PAUL and Luis Quintanilla have collaborated on a devastating attack with pen and pencil on Hollywood and all its works. The puerile restrictions of the Hays Code are only partly to blame for the mawkish productions which are foisted on the public. Mr. Paul reproduces that extraordinary document in full, and Senor Quintanilla points up some of its more outstanding absurdities. The code itself, however is only one element in the situation. The producers themselves, the whole devious process by which a "story" is evolved, and the star system contribute to the general chaos.

CHRISTOPHER MORLEY
"At his whimsical, gentle, slightly Rabelasian best"

To drive home his points, Mr. Paul retells some of the familiar stories from the Bible as they would be presented in the movies. Jonah, Samson (equipped with a Seeing-Eye dog), Joshua, Ruth, Noah and Esther are presented in the Hollywood manner.

In the immortal words of the code itself, "Motion pictures are very important as Art. Art enters intimately into the lives of human beings. The motion pictures, which are the most popular of modern arts for the masses, have their moral quality from the minds which produce them and from their effects on the moral lives and reactions of their audiences." And yet, as Mr. Paul demonstrates, the great stories of the Bible, after they have filtered through the code and the minds of the producers, emerge as something totally unrecognizable.

VICTORY IS NOT ENOUGH
THE STRATEGY FOR A LASTING PEACE
By Eqon Ranshofen-Wertheimer
This stimulating book is a challenge to most of the current thinking on the shape of the postwar world. It opposes the comfortable belief that peace can be secured if only we avoid the mistakes of the last peace. The author is especially qualified to write on this vitally important subject by reason of his years of experience as a foreign correspondent and member of the staff of the League of Nations. $3.00

SHABBY GLORY

By
PEGGY GADDIS

JUDGE STEWART peered about the dining-room. The table was laid with the best silver and the china that had belonged to his mother and was so precious it had been buried in the swamp back of the old plantation house when Sherman's men had marched on their devastating way south.

"Ah, I see we are having company for dinner tonight," he observed, a twinkle in his tired blue eyes.

"And why would we not?" demanded Norma lightly. "Isn't it Thursday?"

The judge studied his daughter with a tender smile.

"And Thursday, I believe, is Second Lieutenant Blaine Farmer's day off from training?" he suggested.

"This is the 16th Thursday he has had dinner with us—how clever of you to remember that he has Thursdays off," laughed Norma, meeting her father's eyes but flushing a little under the quizzical look she saw there.

"Well, he's a nice lad, my dear," the judge said quietly.

Norma turned swiftly, caught her father's arm between her two hands, and laid her cheek against his shoulder.

"You do like him, don't you, father?" she asked anxiously.

"I like him very much."

"I'm afraid I more than like him, father," said Norma, and her voice shook just a little.

The judge patted her chestnut-brown hair with a tender caress that made the tears sting her eyes.

"I've known that for a long time, my dear," he said.

"And you don't mind?"

"Certainly I mind. I mind losing my daughter who has been so sweet and long-suffering and unselfish—"

"Oh—you!" derided Norma shakily.

"Let me say it just this once, Norma, my dear," said her father, covering her hand with his own. "Don't think I don't realize what it meant for you to give up everything a 16-year-old girl thinks is fun, just to stay at home and look after the house and your little sister. I haven't said much—but I haven't missed seeing all the countless ways in which you tried to take your mother's place. It's been a long time, my dear—eight years! And you've done a good job. If you are going to find happiness and a life of your own now, it is surely no more than you deserve."

Norma smiled at him. "You're sweet, father—and I've loved looking after you and Carol. But she's a big girl now, and she will take my place—"

"Don't fool yourself, my dear. Nobody will ever take your place!" her father protested.

Norma kissed him. "Thank you for that, angel," she said. "Carol will be home soon, and with Emma here, she can take care of you—"

The judge asked: "Young Farmer has asked you to marry him?"

Norma laughed and the color mounted to the very roots of her hair, though she met her father's eyes bravely.

"Not yet," she admitted. "But the words are trembling on his tongue. I've known it for several days. It may come at any time. Tonight, perhaps."

"You are so sure?"

Norma laughed again, a soft silvery chuckle.

"Any woman who is deeply in love knows when she is loved in return," she confided. "I am so sure of him—it's in his eyes and in his voice. Oh, I know he loves me, father!"

The judge nodded and patted her shoulder.

"Well, I don't doubt it in the least. He'd have to be blind and deaf and dumb not to love you—and he seems a fairly intelligent young man."

"Fairly intelligent?" Norma scoffed. "Your honor, how you do talk! Why, he's brilliant—and perfectly marvellous—and—"

"I get the idea, I think," said her father drily.

There was the sound of a footstep on the uneven brick walk that led from the gate to the steps.

"There he is now, father. Entertain him while I run up and powder my nose," Norma stammered, and fled by way of the back stairs.

In the large corner room that had been hers since her mother's death, she stood for a moment before the old-fashioned dressing table, her hands over her hot cheeks.

"You're being a complete zany," she told herself unsteadily, looking at her reflection, seeing the tumbled chestnut-brown curls, the starry brown eyes, the flushed cheeks. Her soft red mouth trembled a little, so that when she tried to outline its curves with a lipstick, she had difficulty in getting the color smooth.

As she put down the lipstick and the powder puff, her eyes met those of a girl whose large photograph looked at her coolly. Carol had sent the photograph a month or so ago. It was an obviously expensive job, and Norma had been distressed at the idea of the expense even before she had realized that Carol was really lovely.

She looked now at the shoulder-length blonde hair, smartly waved into a becoming coifure, held in place by clusters of small blossoms; the coolly amused eyes that she knew were blue; the small heart-shaped face. Carol was exquisite —a blue-eyed blonde. From childhood she had been the object of admiration and flattery, so that she was not to be blamed if now, at 18, she was completely convinced of her importance in the world.

Early in life Carol had demonstrated her calm and deeply rooted conviction that only the best was good enough for her. And Norma, adoring her had catered to her. It had been Carol who had had new frocks, while Norma's had catered to her. It had been Carol who had had new frocks, while Norma's were remodelled, dyed, turned and used again and again. Norma had stopped high school in her third year, in order to take up the burdens her tired mother had laid down. Carol had finished high school. Later, an expensive finishing school had received her, and would in a few weeks send her home "finished" and ready for life on her own terms—if one read Carol's thoughts correctly.

Well, it was nearly over. Norma reminded herself, and her tired shoulders drooped a little. Carol would be home, and she, Norma, would marry Blaine, and life would begin for Norma. Blaine had almost finished his training period. He would go back to the northern city where his father owned a large industrial plant and a position was waiting for Blaine.

She pulled herself together after a moment, her heart rising in her throat at the thought that Blaine was downstairs now waiting for her; and she went down with the feeling that there were wings on her feet.

CHAPTER II

—CAROL COMES HOME—

BLAINE was watching the door. The minute she stepped through it he was on his feet, tall and lithe and sunburned, his blue eyes warm and eager the lamplight shining on his fair hair.

"Hello," was all he said. A word so casual, so matter of fact, that one could never dream the sudden small chiming of golden bells that it started in Norma's heart.

She returned his greeting, noting as she did so that he was in dress uniform; the sleekly fitted, beautifully tailored tunic, the lighter trousers, his boots polished until they shone. Could that be, her startled heart wondered, because tonight he meant to—

Emma, enormous and very black in voluminous white apron, hovered at the door. Norma met her eyes and nodded. Dinner was ready and Emma had no idea of permitting it to grow cold while her "white folks" chattered.

When dinner was over the judge said firmly:

"You two young people will have to excuse me. I've got some reading to do—a brief to prepare. You two go and look at the moon. The jessamine's in bloom, and it's a crying shame to be inside on such a night."

Blaine and Norma walked out on the veranda. As in most old-fashioned houses in small towns in the deep South, there was an enormous veranda that ran around three sides of the building. At one end a giant night-blooming jessamine offered shade from midsummer heat during the day, and an exquisite fragrance at night when the dew was heavy.

There was a canvas swing here at this corner of the porch; several wicker chairs that Norma had painted white and whose cushions she had covered in water-repellent awning cloth. It was a pleasant place on a hot afternoon. But tonight, with the air drenched with the heady scent of the jessamine, the moon a silvery flood on the lawn, making a mosaic of black and white beneath the moss-hung live-oaks, it was an enchanted spot.

To herself Norma said, "All my life I'll remember this moment!" And had no way of realizing how bitterly true that thought was going to be.

The night was still, save for the soft chirping of summer insects. The old Stewart place was at the end of the block, where the paved street gave way to a country road. The peace and quiet of it had been disturbed somewhat by the coming of the air base to the little coastal town.

At the end of the street they heard the sound of a car. It came closer. And Blaine said suddenly, "I can't begin to tell you, Norma, what all this has meant to me—coming here to see you and the judge—the time you've given me—this house, like an oasis of peace and quiet—"

The car had stopped in front of the house. It was a taxi, and out of it a girl was stepping. Even before she heard that light, gay voice, Norma knew it was Carol, and was shocked at the wave of rebellion that swept over her at the sight of her sister, at a moment like this.

Carol came running up the walk laughing. Norma and Blaine rose to welcome her. From the foot of the steps, Carol looked up at them. The silver moonlight turned her shoulder-length hair to gold, and her voice was warm and gay.

"Got any money, Norma? I'm just fresh out of taxi fare—and that beast of a driver won't charge it." She laughed, as though it were the greatest joke in the world.

Blaine stepped forward into the moonlight and, as Norma saw the look on his face, her heart gave a little sickening lurch and seemed to stop beating.

"Let me deal with the beast of a taxi driver," suggested Blaine eagerly.

"You are nice," cooed Carol. As Blaine went down the walk, she looked back at Norma and said, "Darling, you've been holding out on me! I'd have been back ages ago if I'd known there was a dream prince like that wandering about. Who the dickens is he?"

"Lieut. Blaine Farmer," answered Norma almost stiffly. Then she added, "What are you doing home, Carol? School's not out yet—"

"School isn't, but I am," answered Carol, her eyes on Blaine, who was settling with the taxi driver and picking up Carol's handsome luggage. "They threw me out, darling—can you picture that? Just for some silly little thing—I almost forget what!"

"Carol! You mean you were expelled?" cried Norma.

Carol looked up at her coolly, obviously undisturbed by the whole affair, and puzzled that Norma should be.

"That sounds very unpleasant," she suggested. "Let's just say I graduated ahead of time."

Blaine came back, carrying the baggage, and Norma said, "Carol, this is Lieut. Farmer. Blaine, my sister Carol."

Carol eyed him with frank pleasure. "Nobody told me anything about you," she said, "or I'd have been home long ago."

"Come and see father," said Norma, knowing she sounded curt and unpleasant, but unable to stop herself.

Carol turned to Blaine, dimpling, looking like an engaging but naughty child.

"Come and lend me your support through this ordeal," she said. "Pops may get tough with me."

"I've no doubt you deserve it," said Blaine, but his tone was warm and amused.

The judge looked up from his papers, and, as he saw Carol, Norma saw his expression of welcome and delight. Nobody could help loving Carol, Norma told herself, setting her teeth hard. Carol was so gay and so lovely, and so completely carefree.

Perched on the arm of her father's chair, her father's arm about her, she made an amusing story of the exploit that had sent her home in disgrace six weeks before school closed. Blaine, watching her, laughing with her, was completely absorbed. And when, half an hour later, she conveniently remembered she had promised to send a friend a telegram announcing her safe arrival home, Blaine suggested he would drive her to the telegraph station.

She and Blaine went out. After the sound of Blaine's car had died away, the judge looked uneasily at Norma and cleared his throat. After a moment he said gently, "I wouldn't worry—"

Norma's head went up a little. "No, why should I? After all, it's happened before. It will happen again."

IT was almost midnight when Norma heard Blaine's car at the gate. The moon was still bright and she slipped out of bed and went to stand for a moment at the window, looking out.

Blaine and Carol were still in the car, which was parked beneath the shadow of the giant live-oak. The soft spring night brought her the murmur of their voices, a low laugh from Carol. Then Carol came running up the walk and Blaine drove away.

Norma went back to bed and lay very still. But Carol's footsteps stopped at her door and the door opened gently.

Carol came in and perched on the side of the bed. When she spoke, her voice was caught with the little gleam of excitement that Norma knew so well.

"Normie, he's darling! I'm crazy about him!"

Norma set her teeth hard on her lower lip before she could say thinly, "Really, Carol! You've scarcely met him."

Carol's laugh was a golden sound.

"Of course—but I met him in my own home where he is obviously a privileged visitor. That means you and Pops approve of him, so he must be all right," she answered. And then she added curiously, "By the way, angel-face, where did you meet him?"

Norma spoke sharply, resentment thick in her tone. "Is it so astounding that I should meet an attractive man? I'm only 24, you know. I met him at the USO. I'm a hostess. We have two dances a week."

"Well, I must say you and Pops know how to pick 'em! And I'll have to look into this USO thing. How does one get elected a hostess?"

"In your case, it ought to be easy," Norma told her. "I'll sign you up and sponsor you."

Carol leaned forward, kissed Norma's cheek and said with a prodigious yawn, "Gosh, I'm sleepy. I'll toddle along to bed. And don't call me early. One of the things I've looked forward to is sleeping until noon and having breakfast in bed."

"I don't know how Emma will react to that," Norma warned her.

"You leave Emma to me. I know how to handle her!"

After the door closed behind Carol, Norma lay still for a long moment. Yes, Carol knew how to handle Emma. Carol knew how to handle most of the people with whom she came in contact. She could be so sweet and so coaxing, so winning—and so completely selfish and unscrupulous, Norma added. And was promptly ashamed of herself.

Carol had always shirked her share of any household tasks; she had always managed to see to it that no matter what the state of the family's finances, whatever luxuries she wanted came her way.

The judge had retired from the bench some years before, to resume private practice. His income was small and there were months when only by superhuman ingenuity and self-sacrifice could Norma make ends approach each other —they never met! The vegetable garden at the rear of the house, the chicken runs, and the pig that came each spring to live in the pen at the foot of the garden, and every winter departed this life to provide meat for the table—it was through such small and laborious subterfuges as these that Norma was able to run the house at all and keeping her father looking neat and Carol looking lovely. Norma herself managed as best she could on what was left over, which was usually very little.

Now that Carol was home from school, a terrific expense had been lifted from the family finances. That microscopic trust fund a grandfather had left for the education of the two girls could now be diverted into household channels and would make an enormous difference in Norma's problems. But even that thought did not lift her spirits greatly. For she could not get out of her mind that breathless moment on the veranda behind the fragrant jasmine vine, when Blaine had sat looking at her and instinct told her he had been on the verge of a proposal. If only Carol had been a day later—an hour, even! Norma set her teeth hard and rose in bed to turn her pillow over and thump it hard. For the result, she realized, would have to be the same. No matter how firmly engaged she might have been to Blaine, the moment he looked at Carol it would have been all off.

In the morning, after an almost sleepless night, Norma laughed at herself for having taken Blaine's attentions to Carol so seriously. After all, what else could he do but offer to drive her to the telegraph office? Carol had practically demanded it. And if, on their way back, they stopped somewhere for a dance or two and lingered on—did that mean anything more than that Carol had suggested it and Blaine had not been able to refuse?

Norma was happiest always with her feet against the rich red-brown soil and her face lifted to the blue sky. People said she had "a green thumb," meaning that whatever she planted grew and flourished. She went out to the garden, a basket swinging from her arm.

When she went back to the house with her basket well filled, eight fresh eggs in one corner of it, she found Emma preparing a tray to be taken to Carol.

"She ain't been home in a long time —I expects us had better humor her a bit, Miss Norma," she explained her action.

CHAPTER III

—ENGAGEMENT FOR CAROL—

BEFORE the end of the week Norma knew that any emotion Blaine might once have felt for her had been swallowed up in his infatuation for Carol. He had taken one look at her and, from that moment on his heart had been in her keeping.

The local base was an Air Corps training station. Men were sent here after a preliminary training period elsewhere, so that after receiving their pilots' wings they were transferred to active duty—some few being kept on to assist with training the replacements that poured in as soon as those who had finished poured out. Thus Blaine was held over. He was confident that he would be put on the reserve list and released to return to his father's great industrial plant, which was working on war orders.

Two weeks after Carol came home Blaine arrived for his regular Thursday night dinner. All day Carol had worn an air of smiling mystery, but she had not explained herself.

Blaine arrived early. Neither Carol nor Norma was downstairs to greet him,

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Peggy Gaddis

Given a typewriter, plenty of paper and a crowd of people, Peggy Gaddis will turn out a short story before you can think up a plausible alibi. And by the time you've finished explaining how you will write The Great American Novel when you have leisure and seclusion she will be well into her next novel. For Peggy Gaddis does not wait for leisure which might never come in her busy life, nor does she insist upon the supposedly essential quiet in which to write.

"No doubt it was my early newspaper training which taught me to write against time and in spite of crowds," she explains in her soft southern voice.

Born in Georgia, Mrs. Gaddis reversed the usual order of things by starting her writing career with the movies. Then came motion picture publicity, newspaper work, short fiction and finally the full-length novel, usually about business girls and inevitably with a dash of mystery to spice the romances.

. . . Aside from writing, which is both vocation and avocation with her, Mrs. Gaddis has many hobbies. Chief among them are Georgia history, old-fashioned patchwork quilts, motion pictures and "arm-chair travelling" to places which she fully intends to visit. "Some day I'll really go, too," she says.

so he and Judge Stewart had half an hour to themselves. Norma, after having assured herself that dinner was all she wanted it to be, had slipped up the back stairs to freshen herself a little before seeing Blaine. As she came up the back stairs she saw Carol, crisp and fresh in a white embroidered pique dress, go dancing down the front stairs. Norma had worked hard all day, while Carol had lain in the old canvas swing half asleep, a pitcher of iced lemonade and a new book on the table beside her.

But Norma set her teeth against that feeling and went on into her room. She had brushed her curls into a semblance of order and was powdering her nose when there was a knock at the door and her father came in.

Norma caught her breath at sight of him. There was a sick look in his eyes as he closed the door and sat heavily in a chair beside the open window.

"Father, what is it?"

"I'm quite all right, Norma. It's—well, I've got to tell you something, and I'd rather cut off my right hand."

Norma braced herself. "Yes, father?"

Her father nodded. "I think you know," he said gently. "Young Farmer has just asked my consent to his marriage to Carol."

Norma sat very still there on the little footstool before him. It was like her father to deal her one mercifully swift, hard blow like that, without trying to soften it by prolonging the moment. It was like him to know that she preferred the blow in such fashion.

"Does—does Carol—" She stopped to moisten her lips, knowing it was silly to go on.

"Carol has just assured me that she adores him and will drown herself in the river—which is all of two feet deep—if I try to keep them from being married immediately."

"Of course, you told them it was all right, father?"

"What else could I tell them? I couldn't very well tell young Farmer I'd like to kick him from here to end of the city limits for making you unhappy, could I?"

For just a moment Norma let herself go soft. She put her arms about her father and clung to him hard. Then she put such weakness behind her and pulled herself to her feet. The evening must be endured somehow. She must call up her pride—that fragile, tattered garment that is a woman's last comfort—and wrap it about herself. She must never let Carol or Blaine suspect that there had been a time when she had thought Blaine loved her and that he had wanted to marry her.

And so, with her head held high, her hand through the judge's arm, she walked beside him down the stairs. In the living-room she faced Blaine and said coolly, "What's all this I hear about you marrying my sister? See here, sir, that's serious business, my lad."

"You bet it is—the most serious thing in my life," said Blaine. Was there a hint of relief in his eyes. Had he, for a moment, feared that maybe she cared for him? Had he felt a bit awkward in facing her as Carol's accepted suitor? Norma lifted her chin a trifle higher.

"I'll take good care of her, I swear it," Blaine was saying. "I'll do everything I possibly can to make her happy."

"I'm sure you will," answered Norma, but she could not warm the words or make them sound other than dry and colorless.

But no one seemed to notice, and the evening passed off surprisingly well. Later, when Blaine had gone, Carol came into Norma's room. Norma was deeply thankful that the light was out at the time.

"WHAT did you think of my ring, Normie?" she asked.

It was a diamond. A stone not of great size, but of exceptional purity and depth, in an old-fashioned yellow gold setting.

"I think it was very sweet of Blaine's mother to send it to him, for you," answered Norma. "He said it had been worn by three generations of Farmer fiancees."

"Yes—you can imagine?" Carol sounded disgusted. "But I'm going to make him have the setting changed."

"Oh, Carol, no! You can't do that!"

"Why can't I? After all, I'm going to have to wear the thing," protested Carol.

"But, Carol, the sentiment—tradition. Blaine would be hurt—his mother outraged. You are supposed to pass it on to your own son, for your daughter-in-law."

"Now there," stated Carol grimly, "is as gruesome a little thought as I'd care to encounter in a day's journey."

"Why, Carol!"

"Don't 'why, Carol' me, angel-face! I certainly have no intention of wearing a monstrosity of an engagement ring just on the off chance that when I'm an old lady I may just possibly have a son to pass it on to—or a daughter."

"Carol," Norma said levelly, "are you in love with Blaine?"

"Oh, sure. But that doesn't mean I intend to start raising a family—not for years and years and years—if ever!"

"Blaine's very fond of children."

"Okay. Then we'll adopt some—as many as the dear lad wants!"

"Oh, Carol!"

"You're in love with Blaine yourself, aren't you, Norma?" Carol said unexpectedly.

It caught her so completely off guard that for a moment Norma was speechless. Carol leaned forward and switched on the bedside lamp. In its yellow glow she looked down at her sister. Before Norma could turn her head from the light Carol had read her anguished look, her sick pallor.

Fumblingly Norma's hand reached for the light switch and turned it off. She had not tried to answer Carol in words, and now there was no need for words.

After a little silence Carol said huskily, like an abashed child, "I'm sorry as the dickens, Normie. I never dreamed you were really serious about the guy."

"Didn't you?" asked Norma faintly, an edge in her voice that she was powerless to dull.

Carol gave a little chuckle, and even in the darkness Norma could sense the shrug that went with it.

"Oh, well, maybe I did suspect it," Carol drawled. "But, after all, it's me the man wants to marry. Even if I turned him down, that doesn't mean you could take him on the rebound. So I might just as well go ahead and marry him, don't you think? Anyway, that would keep him in the family. He's much too good a matrimonial bet to escape us. Oh, by the way, I came in to tell you Blaine and I have decided it would be silly to find an apartment here and go to all the bother of getting settled when he will be discharged in a couple of months. We're just going to stay on here. He'll pay board, and that'll make things a lot easier for you and Pops."

"Oh, no!" Norma set her teeth hard against the revulsion of feeling that shook her at the idea. And then she tried to soften that sharp protest. "You must have a little place of your own, Carol."

"Why?" demanded Carol. "We'll be leaving here as soon as Blaine's year is up. After all, you know how impossible it is to find a house or an apartment in town, with the winter tourists here, as well as the wives and families of some of the men at camp. Blaine has only two more months of his year's training to go, and then we'll be going to his home. He feels sure his father will give us a smart apartment. Of course, Blaine wants a house. Wouldn't you know he would? But I refuse to be tied down to anything like that. I want an apartment—maybe in a hotel—where we won't have to bother with housekeeping. I'm not anxious to have Blaine find out—not right away anyway—that I can't cook—wouldn't, even if I could."

"That's the wrong attitude to take, Carol. Blaine wants a home—not just a hotel room."

Even in the darkness Norma could guess at the cynical smile that touched Carol's mouth; the derisive look in her eyes.

"Then Blaine should have fallen in love with someone of the domestic type—you, for instance. But we won't talk about it any more now."

She stood up with that lovely flowing motion that made her every movement graceful and lithe and beautifully co-ordinated.

"I'll run along now and get some sleep. See you in the morning, angel-face—not too early, if you don't mind!" she finished. And, from the doorway, she added a careless, "Good-night, chum."

CHAPTER IV

—NIGHT OF DECEMBER 7—

BECAUSE Blaine's discharge was a thing so close at hand, and he would be taking his bride home permanently, and because he could only get a few days leave now, they decided to spend their brief honeymoon at Miami Beach. The season was a little late for it, but Carol had never been to Miami Beach, and the enthusiastic reports of it that she had heard from girls at school had whetted her curiosity.

The problem of a trousseau was one that Carol settled with a characteristic aplomb.

"The sales will be on, along Lincoln Road," she told Norma coolly. "And, as Blaine's wife, I'll shop up a breeze and let him pay for it. No sense in running Pops into debt for clothes that Blaine Farmer's wife will be wearing. I've got plenty left over from my spring school clothes—so don't give it a thought, angel-face."

Standing in the church parsonage, where Carol had elected to be married, with only her father and Norma for witnesses, Norma heard the words of the marriage service, and could not keep back the tears. But they were tears, she admitted to herself, for Blaine—not for Carol! No one need weep for Carol at such a wedding.

As they drove away Judge Stewart sighed heavily, looked down at Norma and said, "Heaven help them both!"

Startled, Norma looked up at him. "That's—that's an odd thing to say about your own daughter."

"She's as hard as nails, that young one," said the judge with a rare burst of frankness. "I'm afraid, my dear, that you and I bungled badly in bringing her up. She was so pretty, and so sweet, I guess we pretty much let her run roughshod over us. And now—Farmer's going to have to pay the bill for us."

"Father, you mustn't say such things about her," protested Norma. "She loves him—"

"I wonder," said the judge.

When the training period was extended to 18 months instead of 12, and when Carol was forced to believe that it really meant Blaine would be at camp eight months longer, instead of two, she staged the first real tantrum of her brief married life, and Blaine was a little appalled at the sight.

It was, to Carol, the final straw when Blaine, now promoted to a first lieutenancy, was ordered into active duty, overseas—Hawaii, in fact. And that, because of her condition, she could not follow him. She must wait here until the birth of her child. As soon as she and the child were able to travel, she could join her husband in Hawaii. The thought did not console her appreciably. It only deepened her resentment against the child, and her unreasonable attitude towards Blaine and her father and Norma.

It was September when Blaine left. His six months of marriage had aged him, it seemed to Norma, saying good-by to him after a tempestuous scene he had shared with Carol in their room upstairs. Carol, in hysterics, had been put to bed by the faithful Emma, who was sitting with her now.

"Try not to worry too much about her, Blaine," said Norma, struggling desperately against her own emotion at seeing him go. "I'm afraid father and I spoiled her badly—and women in her condition are not notable for calmness and reasonableness. She'll be terribly sorry about all the ugly things she has said, when she's had time to think them over."

It was an autumn none of them were ever to forget. As the weeks passed, Carol's temper seemed to curdle. She had to be driven to take the mild exercise that Dr. Andrews insisted upon. She had to be forced to eat the things he prescribed. She made the whole household as miserable as she possibly could.

But on the Sunday afternoon of December 7th, a pleasantly mild day, she and Norma had walked for awhile along the country road at the end of their street and had come back into the house just as the radio was broadcasting that world-shaking attack on Pearl Harbor.

Caught to a stunned silence, Norma had listened to the incredible report, forgetting everything else. Carol, beside her, clung to the lintel of the door, her violet-blue eyes widening in her white face until they seemd to swallow up that pallor.

Hickham Field! Blaine was there, said Norma's stunned, shaken heart. Hickham Field had been bombed—had suffered heavy casualties!

And then a little moan from Carol jerked her about to face the girl who was clinging to the door. Carol's eyes swung to Norma's and she said huskily "Now they won't let me go, will they?"

Before Norma could catch her, she pitched forward in a dead faint.

Carol's baby was born before morning. A tiny scrap of humanity that seemed unwilling to continue long in this strange new world he had entered. For a little, Carol's condition was critical. Then she passed the crisis and, when her child was three days old the nurse brought him to her.

Norma, sitting beside the bed, white and strained from the three tumultuous days of anxiety, turned the corner of the blue blanket back and revealed the tiny red face that looked like an incredibly old face.

"Isn't he beautiful, Carol?" said Norma, her voice awed with the wonder of this miracle.

"Beautiful?" repeated Carol. "It's the most repulsive looking object I ever saw. Take it away—I don't want to see it!"

"Carol!" Norma was stunned.

"It's a boy, Mrs. Farmer," the nurse said stiffly.

"So what?" said Carol. "So he's a boy. Well, I don't like boys. Get him out of here!"

The nurse stalked out with the bundle of blankets that seemed too small to be anything more.

"Carol, you are not yourself," Norma said.

"Oh, yes, I am. I was never more so," she answered curtly. "I never wanted a baby—"

"Oh, Carol, don't start that again. He's going to be a beautiful baby. He's Blaine's baby."

"Then Blaine can have him. I don't want him."

"We won't talk about it now," Norma said soothingly. "You'll feel differently later on."

"Will I?" asked Carol drily, a disdainful look in her eyes.

"Of course you will." Norma bent to kiss her cheek. "I'll run along now, so you can get some sleep."

When she reached the door Carol called to her.

"Has there been any word from Blaine?" she asked, and her tone was almost casual.

Norma had to set her teeth above a sob before she could clear her voice enough to answer. "Not yet," she said, "but that's because of censorship, and the like. The telegraph office accepted a cable for him this morning, but only on condition that I absolved them from any blame if they were unable to deliver it right away. So it may be a day or two before we hear."

Carol nodded, as though completely satisfied.

CHAPTER V

—A TELEGRAM—AND TIM MORGAN—

WHEN Norma returned to the house, the judge was sitting before the fire in the library, his head sunk a little on his shoulders. Norma's heart turned over in her breast at the sight of the yellow slip of paper between his lax fingers.

For a moment she could not move from the doorway. She stood there as though rooted to the spot. At last her father saw her, straightened a little, and made a convulsive movement that would have concealed the telegram. But Norma moved forward stiffly and took it in shaking fingers. Before the words blurred in a mist of tears, she read:

"The war department regrets to state—"

She slid down on her knees beside her father, the yellow slip of paper fluttering to the floor. That floor that seemed to heave beneath her feet. The only solidity, the only reality in all the world, was the judge's arms about her, his breast against which she sobbed until there were no more tears.

Blaine was dead. Just now, just where, just when—no one knew. The telegram had stated merely: "Killed in action." A soldier's epitaph.

Shortly after midnight a telegram came from Blaine's parents, announcing that they would arrive by plane the following day, to be with Carol in her bereavement.

Carol took the news with a calmness that astounded Nurse Anstey and left Norma stunned. She lay still, watching Norma's white, haggard face for a long moment, and then she said quietly, "So Blaine's gone."

"Oh, darling—" Norma had to set her teeth hard in her lower lip to control its trembling.

SHABBY GLORY — By Peggy Gaddis

"I expected it," said Carol, and there was a taut line about her mouth. "I knew I'd never get to Hawaii. I never have any luck. I should have known something like this would happen."

It was one o'clock when Nurse Anstey brought Mr. and Mrs. Farmer to the hospital room where Carol, looking exquisite in a blue crepe bedjacket, a matching ribbon through her curls, awaited them.

Mrs. Farmer was middle-aged and comfortable looking. Her plump, pleasant face was mottled from weeping, despite obviously fresh attempts with a powder-puff. Her black frock and hat were good, but not smart. Her fur coat was caracul, but cut on conservative lines so that it might easily have been last year's—or the year before.

Mr. Farmer was the typical middle-aged, middle-class, prosperous business man. There was about him a strong likeness to Blaine.

They had eyes for nobody but the lovely girl who lay among her pillows, watching them with an almost avid curiosity. And Norma, who was watching Carol, saw the swift disappointment that swept those wide blue eyes as she took in the unpretentious appearance of her mother-in-law and father-in-law.

They were very sweet to her and very gentle. When Nurse Anstey brought the baby, Mrs. Farmer wept painfully, in spite of obvious attempts to restrain the tears.

Mr. Farmer cleared his throat several times and said huskily, "He's the image of his dad, isn't he?"

Norma held her breath, for she could almost guess the retort that trembled on Carol's lips. But the scene was a painful one and Nurse Anstey, watching her patient closely, ended it as soon as she could. Norma went out into the hall with the Farmers, and Nurse Anstey closed the door behind them.

"I hope you can stay awhile, and get acquainted," said Norma. "We are so anxious to know you better. We were all so fond of Blaine."

Norma marshalled them with her out of the hospital and into the car that had been Blaine's but which, after his departure, had of course become Carol's. Judge Stewart was waiting at home to meet them. Emma had prepared a toothsome dinner and the guestroom was fairly bristling with hospitality.

But as they drove away from the hospital, a station taxi stopped and a tall, well built man, whose face was topped by a drift of prematurely gray hair, got out. He was carrying a newspaper camera. Neither Norma nor the Farmers saw him, nor would they have given him a second glance if they had, since none of them had the faintest idea that this man was going to play a tremendously important part in all their lives from this moment on.

THE evening paper carried an account —held up for censorship, of course, and until Blaine Farmer's nearest of kin could be notified—of Blaine's death. He had, in dying, become a hero whose death gave him a sort of immortality. He had gone down in a running fight with half a dozen Japanese planes that had been attacking a partially disabled seaplane carrying a large crew. Blaine had distracted the enemy's attention from the disabled plane, so that it had been able to land safely. Blaine himself had bailed out when his plane was practically shot from under him; and, as the parachute had drifted towards the earth, the enemy had pursued and machine-gunned the helpless man.

The story had the sort of glamour that makes for an unforgettable memory. The name of Blaine Farmer stood out. But before the story was twenty-four hours old, and before it could die out and be swallowed in the heroic exploit of some other courageous boy, a photograph swept the country. It was the picture of a wide-eyed girl with a ribbon in her hair—and a small bundle, out of which peered the tiny face of a newborn baby. And under the picture ran the words:

"Mrs. Blaine Farmer, and the young son born to her almost within the hour that her heroic young husband was giving his life for his country."

People looked at the picture; their hearts burned with regret for this brave lad, and with pity for the two he had left behind him. And Tim Morgan, who had taken that photograph of a pretty girl and her fatherless baby, suddenly realized that he had on his hands the sort of a story a newspaper man dreams of.

Tim was 39. He was tall and lean, and he walked with an arrogantly self-assured swing. There was a cynical look in his dark eyes. His mouth was thin-lipped, rather wide, and could snap shut like a steel trap. His hair was thick and dark and usually rumpled, and there were a few streaks of premature gray in its thickness that added exactly the proper spice to his good looks.

He had been on vacation at Miami Beach when the attack came on Pearl Harbor. There had been a couple of small assignments he had expected to cover en route home. Then the story about Blaine Farmer had hit the front pages, and he had discovered that on his way back north he would go within a few miles of Blaine's home—where his young wife lived. And because he never passed up what gave any indication of turning into a story, he had gone to the town. There he had learned that Blaine Farmer's wife had given birth to a son at about the same time Blaine was supposed to have died. He decided to stop off and see about a photograph. When he had seen Carol —well, the photograph turned into several, and, to his own surprise, Tim had decided to stay over for the night. The local hotel wasn't bad; he might have a talk with some of Blaine's friends here in town—and he might sell an interview with Blaine's wife.

He telephoned the New York newspaper from his hotel. They not only wanted a story from Blaine's wife, they'd take a serial—half a dozen chapters. Tim would write it, of course, but Carol would sign it. There would be a nice cheque for Carol and the boy.

But it was not until the afternoon, when a telephone call came from the director of one of the big advertising agencies in New York, asking Tim to arrange for Mrs. Farmer to appear on a radio broadcast two weeks from that night, that Tim began to realize what he really had on his hands.

He told Carol about it that afternoon. They had understood each other from the first. Tim had looked deep into Carol's violet-blue eyes and had said to himself, "She's on the make for what she can get! Well, who can blame the kid? After all, if she can pick herself up some change—she's got a youngster to bring up—and she's pretty as the dickens and photographs like nobody's business!"

Carol listened quietly while Tim explained to her about the radio appearance. "All you have to do is answer a few questions," he explained. "Maybe read a little speech—"

"I wouldn't know how to make a speech," protested Carol, wide-eyed.

Tim studied her, his dark eyes touched with a cynical light.

"You won't have to," he told her. "I'll write the speech for you."

"I hoped you would."

CHAPTER VI

—BUSINESS ARRANGEMENT—

THEY looked at each other for a long moment, each taking the other's measure. And in that moment each began to understand the other far better than if they had known each other for months under more ordinary circumstances.

Tim said quietly, so gently that for an instant the full implication of his words scarcely reached her, "You were very deeply in love with your husband, of course?"

For an instant she was still. Then he saw her eyes flash and her color burn deeply.

"How dare you ask me such a question?" she said through her teeth.

Tim grinned. Then, solemnly, he took a coin from a pocket of his trousers and tucked it carefully into his vest pocket. Puzzled, Carol followed the movement of the coin, and then demanded:

"Why did you do that?"

"I bet myself two bits that you were the kind of girl to draw yourself to your full height and say 'how dare you?' in a freezing voice," Tim told her pleasantly.

Her eyes flashed with anger, but she bit back the sharp retort. For one of the very few times in her life Carol had met her match; someone who wasn't in the least impressed by her beauty and charm; someone who looked straight through the windows of her violet-blue eyes, straight down into the very heart of her, and saw there a Carol that she herself was a little reluctant to acknowledge. A Carol who was selfish and arrogant and shallow, a stranger to deep and lasting emotion.

Tim watched her hands clench against the satin coverlet she had insisted on having brought from her room at home to the hospital. He watched the way her small teeth set hard in her painted lower lip. Suddenly he chuckled and said briskly:

"Well, shall we get started?"

"With what?"

"Your life story—your romance with America's Number One Hero—as of today. My paper will write you a nice little cheque. I will write the story. You will furnish pictures. What could be nicer than that?"

"I haven't said I would."

"No—but you haven't said you wouldn't," answered Tim reasonably. "So I'm taking it for granted that you will. I'm also arranging the contract for the radio appearance. Another nice cheque—and all expenses paid to New York and return. After all, why not? You have a son to support; it's easy work—and you've got it."

He saw the look in Carol's eyes and grinned to himself. He took an envelope from his pocket, turned it on its blank side and said briskly, "Well, let's go. You were born in Fairfield, I take it? How many beauty contests did you win as a girl? And what other exciting things happened to you?"

When, a little later, the nurse firmly turned him out of the room, he went with a little satirical gleam in his eyes. And, in his heart, a sort of exasperated question as to what a man like Blaine Farmer—who must, from all accounts, have been quite a guy!—had ever seen in this amazingly pretty but empty-headed girl. But he added to himself the purely masculine observation that it was usually the swellest guys who mixed themselves up with the fluffiest, most lightweight of feminine numbers.

On his way out of the hospital he encountered a group coming in. Among them was a tall, almost regal looking girl with burnished brown hair and brown eyes that stirred even his pulses a little. A girl who was not beautiful in the strict definition of that word, but whose oval face had so much strength, so much character, that a man could spend his life happily analyzing its lure.

WITH the girl were two people; middle-aged, prosperous—but not outstanding. As they came abreast of him, the girl said, "Let me help you, Mrs. Farmer."

Tim stood still, startled. The three people looked at him, puzzled, and Tim whipped off his hat. He put on his most engaging grin and said, "You are Mr. and Mrs. Farmer, I believe. I'm Tim Morgan of the New York Metropolis. I'd like to talk to you, if I may, about your son."

Mrs. Farmer put a shaking hand to her lips. Mr. Farmer said quickly, "Sorry, Mr. Morgan—we'd prefer not to be interviewed. Thanks just the same."

And, without waiting, he hurried Mrs. Farmer on up the steps.

Tim said to the tall and intriguing girl, "Are you the young Mrs. Farmer's sister?"

"Yes," said Norma quietly. "But I'm afraid I feel as Mr. and Mrs. Farmer do, Mr. Morgan. You must excuse me."

"Oh—please wait, Miss Stewart. I should think you would be glad to have the world know as much as it wants to about Lieut. Farmer. After all, publicity—" began Tim, and could have kicked himself for the inept word.

"I don't think publicity would mean very much to him now—do you, Mr. Morgan? And I am quite sure that we, his family, feel that we are entitled to a certain amount of privacy. He gave his life for his country. That's glorious, I suppose. But it's his glory, Mr. Morgan, don't you think? Why should we try to snatch some of it for ourselves, even if we could?"

Tim had the queerest sensation as he met her straight, almost contemptuous look. He, Tim Morgan, who had never been ruffled in the slightest degree by a woman, felt as though he was drowning! As though the most important thing in the world was to have this woman smile at him, warmly. He jerked his thoughts back, aghast at the direction they were taking, and said hurriedly, "Well, anyway, I'm glad young Mrs. Farmer doesn't feel that way. After all, the U.S.A. likes to lionize its heroes—and nothing the world can give is too much for the wife and family of the man who did his part so gloriously."

Norma, paling a little, demanded sharply:

"What do you mean—young Mrs. Farmer doesn't feel as I do? You haven't been interviewing her?"

"Better than that. She has signed a contract to give us a four or five-instalment serial of her life and romance with Lieut. Farmer," said Tim.

"Oh, no!" Norma cried in sharp protest.

"Oh, yes. She is also appearing on the radio on a coast-to-coast hook-up two weeks from tonight—for a very good fee, I assure you!"

Then his hand shot out and steadied Norma as she swayed a little and put a shaking hand to her forehead.

"She can't do this. She mustn't! It's —it's not decent," she gasped.

"Oh, come now, Miss Stewart," Tim protested, but she brushed his hand from her arm and said curtly, "You must forget all this. Carol is not herself. She couldn't possibly do such a thing."

"I'm afraid she has her mind made up. She has signed both contracts. And I feel sure this is just the beginning. She's young, beautiful and very appealing."

"My father is Judge Stewart," Norma said stiffly. "A very able attorney. I feel quite sure that he can find a way to break the contracts."

"If Mrs. Farmer wants them broken. Maybe she does—though, she seemed quite pleased with them," Tim said, but Norma had brushed past him and gone swiftly up the steps and into the hospital.

She hurried upstairs and found Mr. and Mrs. Farmer standing at the glass-enclosed nursery, adoring their tiny grandson, whom a smiling Nurse Anstey was holding up for their approval.

They did not see Norma as she went past them to Carol's room. Carol was propped up against her pillows, a long-handled mirror in her hand, anxiously studying her skin and eyes and hair, as though to make sure that her motherhood had not destroyed her loveliness.

As Norma came in she hastily slid the mirror under the covers and turned a bland and innocent smile to Norma's greeting. But Norma was too outraged for a casual greeting.

"Carol, I met the most astounding creature outside the hospital just now," she began.

Carol's blue eyes flickered and then she smiled sweetly.

"That must have been Tim Morgan—rather nice, don't you think?"

"Carol, you can't possibly have taken him seriously. I mean, you can't have signed those incredible contracts."

"But I did—and very good ones they are, too." Carol's jaw set a little and her violet-blue eyes chilled until they were more blue than violet. "He is quite sure he can dig up some more—and perhaps better ones—for me."

"Carol, you must be out of your mind! Trading on what Blaine has done."

CHAPTER VII

—MORGAN VISITS NORMA—

"I'M Blaine's wife. And the mother of Blaine's son? Who has a better right to share the glory?"

"The glory that cost him his life," Norma said.

Carol's look was mutinous. "And will it bring him back, or help him in any way, if I crawl into a hole and pull the hole in after me. If I can manage a career for myself—"

"A career? By trading on Blaine's achievements? By selling your memories, scrap by scrap, and bit by bit, to some horrible yellow newspaper? And going on the radio—what sort of a career did you have in mind, Carol?" asked Norma, her voice so filled with scorn that it seemed to sting like a steel-tipped whip-lash.

Carol's color burned high as she answered sharply:

"Publicity of this sort—well, who knows? I might get a movie test—maybe a movie job. There's no knowing where it will lead. After all, Norma, I'm young—and even if Blaine is gone, I've a right to live."

Neither of them had noticed that the door had opened and Mr. and Mrs. Farmer had come in. Norma had no idea how long they had been there. When Mr. Farmer spoke, she whirled and saw that Mrs. Farmer was white and shocked and that there was a look of horror in her kind, gentle eyes.

"You shouldn't allow Carol to get herself so upset, Norma," said Mr. Farmer, but his eyes upon Carol were cold and hostile.

"I'm sorry," said Norma, turning away.

Mrs. Farmer blurted, "Carol, what is this—this career thing you're talking about?"

"After all," Carol said sulkily, "I have a living to make."

"But you don't, Carol. How could you have thought of such a thing?" Mr. Farmer broke in. "Mother and I have been waiting to talk to you until we felt you were strong enough. Of course, we expect to provide for you to the limit of our ability. You are Blaine's wife—a sort of—well, a sort of legacy, a charge that he left to us. We want to take you and the baby home with us. You will be our daughter. You shall have everything that we can provide to make you happy—and the baby, of course."

Norma all but held her breath as Carol's blue eyes went over Mrs. Farmer from the top of the expensive, but dowdy, hat to the very conservative, almost old-fashioned, shoes. She could see the small curl of Carol's mouth and stiffened even before Carol spoke.

"Thanks. That's very decent of you," Carol said coolly. "But I have some plans of my own—and rather good ones, I think. I shall be able to take care of myself and the baby very well."

"We expected to make you an allowance, Carol."

"I prefer to earn my own living, thanks."

"We will establish a trust fund for the baby," Mr. Farmer went on.

"That's very nice of you. I'm sure he will appreciate it later on."

Mr. and Mrs. Farmer looked at each other uncertainly. They were obviously bewildered by the cold unfriendliness of this lovely looking girl to whom their son had been married, but who was a complete and rather fearful stranger to them.

"Just—just what have you planned to do, Carol?" he asked her at last, hesitantly.

"To begin with, I'm going to sign some articles for a newspaper," said Carol. "Afterwards, I'm going on the radio for an interview."

"About—about Blaine?"

"What else would people be interested at the moment?" Carol wanted to know.

Mr. and Mrs. Farmer gave a little shocked, hurt murmur and Mr. Farmer's hand went out and grasped that of his wife, as though they clung together for mutual support.

"But—but that's rather cheap, don't you think?" stammered Mr. Farmer.

"Not at the price I am going to get."

Mr. and Mrs. Farmer exchanged glances and Mrs. Farmer turned blindly towards the door.

"I can't believe you are serious," said Mr. Farmer. "We will talk about it again, when you are stronger."

"There is nothing to talk about." There was a ring of grim determination in Carol's voice. "I have already signed the contracts. And there will be more of them as fast as Tim Morgan can line them up."

Mr. and Mrs. Farmer went slowly out of the room. They took the next train for home.

NORMA and her father were halfway through dinner when there was a ring at the doorbell and Emma went to answer it. She came back to the dining-room grinning a little.

"Dey's a gen'leman out there what wants to see Miss Norma," she reported. "Dey's plenty o' dat sho't cake—he sho' looks hongry. Can I ask him to step in and have a piece?"

"Why, of course, Emma," answered the judge with instant and unquestioning hospitality. "Who is it?"

Emma did not wait to answer him. Instead, she waddled out and a moment later was ushering Tim Morgan into the dining-room.

Norma half rose, white with anger, but Tim said swiftly, coaxingly, "Oh, look, now, Miss Stewart—put down that gun! At least until I've had that shortcake auntie here has promised me! Anybody with a house as full of delicious smells as this one is surely couldn't turn a starving man from the door."

"I don't think we have met, sir?" Judge Stewart said courteously.

"I'm Timothy Morgan, sir, of the New York Metropolis," said Tim in hi. pleasant, appealing manner.

"Yes, father. This is the gentleman who has brought Caro' her new contracts," said Norma through her teeth.

"Oh," said the judge, and dropped Tim's hand as though it had stung him.

Emma came in bearing an enormous slice of the shortcake, swamped with luscious red berries that had been picked in the garden since noon, and topped with a great mound of whipped cream.

Tim's eyes widened as he saw it.

"Please, judge," he said, "don't set the bloodhounds on me until I've seen whether that is as good as it looks! After all, I'm a starving man."

Emma came in with coffee and Tim sampled the shortcake. He looked up at Emma, closed his eyes, and his face was wreathed with a smile of beatific appreciation.

Emma chuckled delightedly, said, "Go 'long wid yo', sir. It ain't all dat good!"

"It's a poem—a masterpiece of culinary art—perfection complete and unmistakable. It's delectable!" said Tim happily.

"Mr. Morgan means, Emma, that the shortcake is very good," said Norma drily.

"Of course—you get my point," said Tim.

Emma went out, pleased and important.

"You see, father," Norma said, "Mr. Morgan wants us to help him concoct the stories that Carol is going to sign."

The judge looked startled and indignant.

"I'd like some pictures, too—of Mrs. Farmer as a child and so on—anything that will build up the human appeal," said Tim calmly.

"Preposterous!" said the judge. "I cannot permit this—this sensationalism. It's indecent—"

"I'm sorry, sir—but Mrs. Farmer has signed the contracts," said Tim. "I assure you that they are entirely legal and that she can be held to them. Although, since she is quite enthusiastic about the whole thing, there seems no question of any—er—coercion."

The judge looked at Norma and then he passed his hand over his face. Norma was stricken to the heart because he looked so completely dejected.

"I—I'm afraid you'll have to excuse me, Mr. Morgan," he said gravely. "I'm a little too old and a little too tired for this sort of thing. Norma, my dear, will you try to convince the young man of the extreme bad taste of what he has in mind?"

"I will, father—though I don't think it's going to do much good!" answered Norma.

Judge Stewart left the room. Tim looked at Norma and said frankly, "I was afraid he'd throw me out—"

"How could he? You are a guest under his roof. There are certain laws of hospitality, you know."

Tim stared at her and then he shook his head.

"You Southerners! There's no understanding you!"

Norma said politely, "Shall we go into the living-room?"

"Why not?" Tim stood up to follow her.

CHAPTER VIII

—TIM GUESSES A SECRET—

IN the comfortable living-room, Tim said, "What makes you so bitter about your sister selling her story? After all, it's done every day and all over the world."

"My brother-in-law gave his life to defend his country. By so doing he bought a glory for himself and his wife and child that I feel will be made shabby and cheap by this—this commercialization you are planning," said Norma.

"I'm afraid I can't agree with you about that—" began Tim, but Norma cut in sharply:

"If you were in my brother-in-law's place, would you want your widow to do what Carol is planning to do?"

"Frankly, I don't think it would matter in the least. It is my honest conviction that if your brother-in-law had anything to say about it, he would be more than willing for his widow to earn a living for herself and his child."

"But it isn't necessary. Mr. and Mrs. Farmer offered her an allowance and a home. They are establishing a trust fund for the baby—" Norma's voice died beneath the look in Tim's eyes.

"That makes it quite a story. Thanks for giving me so much material," said Tim. He watched as Norma paled and her eyes widened, and there was a dawning wonder in his eyes. "D'you know, it's the darndest thing how, all of a sudden, I am almost tempted to kill the whole thing? Just because of you. Somehow, for the first time in my life, it's startlingly important to me to have a woman's good esteem."

Norma caught her breath and her color deepened, her eyes dawning with hope.

"You—oh, Mr. Morgan, if only you'd stop this thing before it goes any farther—" she stammered.

Tim straightened, as though he threw off a sudden weight. The wonder vanished from his eyes and he was once more brisk and matter of fact.

"For a minute, I almost went soft!" he admitted. "Can you imagine me, Morgan, the bulldog, almost breaking down enough even to think about killing a great yarn? Must be I'm getting batty in my old age!"

Norma was still until the mist of tears had vanished from her eyes. Then she said huskily, "Which means, of course, that you are going on with the story?"

"Of course," said Tim. "It'll make a great human interest yarn. And there are all sorts of things that might develop—who knows? Your sister is young, beautiful. The whole set-up makes her appealing. I think we can really go to town with her."

Norma said quietly, "Will you please leave, Mr. Morgan? Quickly, please! I don't think I can quite tolerate your presence another moment."

Tim looked down at her gravely, and then he said, "I'm sorry about that. I don't suppose you will believe it—but more than anything else in the world I would like to have your respect and liking."

Norma's lips curled in contempt.

"There's probably nothing in the world farther from your reach."

"I suppose not," Tim agreed. "And the thing that makes it worst of all is that by killing this story I could lift myself a lot in your esteem."

"Oh, yes!" said Norma, her eyes flaming with new hope.

"Isn't it the darndest thing?" said Tim. "What I want more than anything else in the world I can only have at the cost of my professional integrity. And if I had no professional integrity, I wouldn't be the sort of man you could love, would I?"

Norma gasped and felt as though someone had thrown cold water in her face.

"The man I could love?" she exclaimed. "Mr. Morgan, have you lost your mind?"

"I hate to be sentimental and sappy," admitted Tim. "But the obvious and completely honest answer to that is: not my mind, but my heart. I knew it this afternoon on the hospital steps. There's been a lot of hooey written, sung and yapped about love at first sight. Hanged if I haven't discovered it really exists. Fantastic, isn't it?"

"Fantastic is scarcely the word!"

"I know—but I can't think of a better one at the moment," said Tim quietly.

He was looking down into her uplifted, indignant face with a warm, curiously soft look in his eyes.

"You dislike me a lot, don't you?" he asked suddenly.

"Frankly, I can't think of anyone I've ever met whom I disliked more."

TIM nodded. "Then this probably won't make you dislike me any more," he said. Before she could guess his intention, he had bridged the short distance that lay between them and his arms had closed about her.

Startled, she flung her head back, only to be more startled when he bent his own and kissed her full upon her soft, warm mouth.

Her hand streaked out and smacked him full across the cheek. A blow that stung and left the marks of her five fingers on his cheek.

He grinned a little as he let her go.

"True to form," he said, and calmly took a coin from his trousers pocket and slipped it into his waistcoat pocket. "I bet myself two bits that would be your reaction."

Norma was so angry that the tears clawed at her throat and she put both shaking hands to her white face, fighting with every drop of courage she possessed not to burst into tears.

"So you were in love with your brother-in-law, too," said Tim.

For a moment the words did not penetrate, with their full implication; but when they did, she jerked herself erect and lifted a drawn face, staring at him out of wide, stunned eyes.

"What—what—how dare you—" she began feebly, and blushed with shame at the triteness of the words.

"There was a vague rumor around town that Farmer was your beau first. When you were so indignant at the thought of your sister selling her story, I began to be a bit suspicious. And when I kissed you just now—well, then I knew you were in love with Farmer. That's why all this is tearing you to bits—"

CHAPTER IX

—CAROL'S STORY SPREADS—

SHE heard Tim speaking, but she only caught a word here and there. She was so badly shaken by his calm summing up of the whole story that, after a moment, she looked up at him and said levelly, "There doesn't seem to be any point in my denying it. You are very clever, Mr. Morgan. It will undoubtedly be quite a story—"

"You didn't think I would shame you by mentioning you in connection with your sister's story, did you?"

Norma said fearfully, "You aren't going to make it a story of two sisters in love with the same man?"

"Do you think I could do that to you—when I'm in love with you, myself?" asked Tim gravely, and in spite of herself she felt her color rising. In spite of herself, too, she knew that he meant what he said.

"That sets you back on your heels a bit, doesn't it?" he asked, reading her expression with an accuracy that was in itself a little disturbing. "Well, it knocks me for a loop, too. But there it is—I can't deny it."

Norma drew a long breath and pulled herself together.

"You are being absurd and a little insulting," she told him.

"Is it an insult that I should love you?" demanded Tim quietly.

"It is an insult that you should expect me to believe you do, when we have barely met—and under such unpleasant circumstances."

Tim nodded as though admitting the inescapable logic of that.

"I know. If I were the hero of a story book, I'd smash the story, tear up the contract I have with your sister, and take myself off in a cloud of dust. I'd weep tears of resignation and resolve to be a bigger and better guy for the rest of my life, sublimating my hopeless love for you by becoming a hero on my own!" he acknowledged almost pleasantly. "Only—I've been a newspaper man since I was seven and started selling papers on the streets. I've been a newspaper man for thirty years. I've just been in love with you for about 30 hours."

"It isn't love, then. Love doesn't come like that," said Norma huskily.

"Oh, love doesn't come like that, eh?" Tim's voice was almost derisive. "You, of course, being an authority on love."

"No, I'm not an authority but—" she began defensively and stopped, scarlet to the roots of her hair.

"But you are in love with Blaine Farmer, and that love did not bloom in the flashing of an eye? It was a thing of slow growth?" Tim's tone was still light and derisive, but there was a speculative look in his eyes that made her suddenly wary.

"I haven't admitted that I was in love with Blaine," she reminded him. "I was very fond of him. He was really fine. I knew him for months. I admire and respect and I applaud the glory he bought so dearly—and which you and Carol plan to make so shabby by the sickening stories you're going to write."

"I resent that," said Tim. "I write very good stories."

Norma drew a long breath and said, "I'm—very tired. I wish you would go, please."

"Okay," said Tim, his tone gentle and warm. "Of course I'll go—poor darling. But—I warn you—don't brush me off. I'll be back—early and often."

Norma soon discovered that opinions in town were divided as to Carol's action in commercializing her husband's memory and the glory for which he had given his life. There were some who felt as Norma and her father felt that Carol was shockingly lacking in a proper reticence. There were others who felt she was doing exactly what they would have done in her place. The most fantastic stories went the rounds. The fairly modest fee that she was to receive for her first broadcast doubled and trebled, and reached an astounding sum by the time it had been repeated around town a few times. The cheque she received for the rights to her story—ghost-written, of course, by Tim—became a sum so large that one was awed by it.

There was, of course, no thought of Carol taking the baby with her when she left for New York. He was still in the incubator at the hospital and it would be another month before he could be brought home. Carol staged a pretty scene of motherly devotion at the hospital when she said good-by to him: a scene that was recorded by cameras and flashed on the screens in motion picture theatres all over the country.

Her arrival in New York was sufficiently impressive to vie with that of a disgruntled Hollywood star in town for a brief "personal appearance" at a local theatre. And her radio appearance was a masterly bit of showmanship. Listening to the brief, deftly written speech that she gave—a speech that pulled out all the tremolo stops and was warranted to bring tears—Norma felt a little sickened.

There were other radio appearances. There was a bond-selling drive that took Carol half-way to the coast and garnered her an enormous amount of publicity. Then she flew home to be photographed carrying the baby down the hospital steps—a photograph that was flashed around the world, captioned by Tim Morgan: "A Hero's Son Goes Home."

The legend beneath the picture read: "Young Blaine Farmer, Jr., son of the man all America loves, leaves the hospital with his lovely young mother, who is devoting her life to war work."

There was no camera handy when, in the taxi, Carol put the baby into Norma's arms and said, "You'd better handle him. He makes me nervous."

Nor were there cameramen present when, after they had reached home, Carol said, "You might as well know it now as later, Norma. I have no intention of being tied down by taking care of him. You've always been a pushover for babies. Suppose you look after him."

From that day on, Carol paid no more attention to the baby than if he did not belong to her—unless there was a cameraman or an admiring stranger present.

Carol was not at all pleased at not hearing from Tim. She had had a month of travel, of being feted and pitied and photographed and interviewed. Then the names of other heroes had come out of the war. Other young and lovely widows had faced the world with courage and optimism. These women who had shied away from any commercialization of their husbands' heroism had blunted the edge of Carol's appeal. People had forgotten about her, because others had come into the limelight.

Late one afternoon, as she sat on the wide old veranda while Norma put the baby to bed, a taxi stopped at the gate and she saw Tim Morgan get out. She leaped to her feet, her eyes sparkling. Tim had come back to take her with him. He had lined up something else exciting for her.

"Oh, Tim, I'm so glad to see you!" she greeted him, and barely managed not to throw herself into his arms. "What's up? What are you planning for me?"

"The gol-darnedest story you or anyone else ever heard," said Tim. "It'll break in every newspaper in the country tomorrow. I chartered a plane to get here in time to tell you myself before you read it in the paper, or before you hear it from official circles."

Carol was a little frightened. "What—what—" she stammered.

"Where's Norma?" demanded Tim. "She'll want to hear it too. There's no point in telling the story twice."

Carol drew him into the house and called Norma.

"What is it, Carol?" asked Norma, coming to the head of the stairs. Then she saw Tim, and the color mounted to the roots of her hair. She drew a swift breath before she managed to say evenly, "Oh—it's you."

"As ever was." Tim nodded. "Come on down, Norma. I've got something you'll want to hear."

"I doubt it," said Norma, elevating her pretty chin a trifle, her eyes hostile. "Whatever you have to say must be for Carol alone. Besides, I'm getting the baby to sleep."

TIM took one step up the stairs and his voice was sharp. "Come down, Norma, or I'll shout my news to you from here—and you won't like that. It's—well, it's something you'd give your ears to hear. I mean it, Norma."

Norma hesitated and Carol snapped, "Oh, come on, Norma. I'm dying of curiosity, even if you are not."

Over her shoulder Norma spoke to Emma, who had been an interested spectator of the whole scene and who went reluctantly back to the baby, deprived of her chance to eavesdrop.

Norma came down the stairs. Tim drew her and Carol into the living-room and pushed them into chairs. Carol gave herself a little pettish shake and said crossly, "Oh, for heaven's sake, Tim—get on with it. Don't be so darned mysterious!"

Tim looked at her oddly and there was a curious glint in his eye.

"Okay, you asked for it," he said grimly. "I was going to lead up to it gradually, but if you want it straight from the shoulder—here it is. Blaine Farmer is alive!"

For a full moment the two girls sat perfectly still. The words echoed and re-echoed in Norma's stunned mind. She said them to herself, half aloud, repeating the words as though they had been some strange, foreign language she could not quite grasp.

"Blaine is alive! Blaine is alive!" The words echoed down the corridors of her empty heart and she seemed to hear far away the loud, exultant ringing of bells. "Blaine is alive! Blaine is alive!"

"I don't believe it!" said Carol at last, almost hysterically.

Tim looked at her curiously and said, "It's true. The news is official. Came from the war department. It's quite a yarn, too."

Norma wet her dry lips with a tongue that seemed scarcely less dry, and very thick.

"How—how do they know?" she whispered at last.

"He landed in California this morning," said Tim. "The news was not released until he was safely in a hospital on the coast."

"Hospital? He's badly hurt?" whispered Norma.

"I'm afraid so—but he's going to recover. The medicos have assured us of that."

"Thank heaven for that," Norma whispered.

CHAPTER X

—BACK FROM THE DEAD—

TIM looked swiftly at her white, haggard face and then at Carol, who was sitting very still, her eyes wide, her face controlled, a look that was almost sulky darkening her eyes.

"It's quite a story," said Tim, addressing himself to Norma then. "It boils down to this: When he bailed out of his plane, it was taken for granted that the Japs, in their usual pretty little custom, contrary to all the rules of civilized warfare, followed him and strafed him as he fell with machine-gun fire. Well, it seems that through some miracle he landed safely on one of the countless tiny atolls that make up the more far-flung of the Hawaiian group. There he was cared for by friendly natives who were so far from so-called civilization that they knew nothing of the war. The old medicine man seemed to be a wizard at patching people up.

"Farmer was delirious for weeks, but finally began to pull through. Then one of the Jap two-men subs, badly damaged, came ashore. They promptly 'captured' the island and all its natives; but the natives, outraged because their traditional hospitality was insulted by the Japs, took them over. One of the natives managed to get to a neighboring island and give the alarm. Gradually the word passed from atoll to atoll until a boat was sent out to bring Farmer back to Honolulu, and he was aboard the first transport to leave, bringing the wounded to the United States. No word of his being alive was given out until the transport had docked safely and he had been interviewed by government officials. The story will appear in every newspaper in the country tomorrow."

He had spoken to Norma as though Carol was not in the room. Carol had listened, that sulky expression in her eyes, her full lower lip caught between her teeth. And when he had finished, she stood up and said briskly, "I'm going out to see him, of course."

"Yes," said Tim gently. "I thought you would. It will make a very nice picture."

"I could fly out and be there day after tomorrow, couldn't I?" said Carol.

Tim nodded. "I've arranged for a plane. Don't you want to come, too?" He turned to Norma and though her very heart cried out to say "yes," she shook her head.

"The baby is too tiny for such a trip—and I couldn't leave him," she said with a finality that left no room for argument.

"I thought perhaps you'd feel like that," said Tim.

"I'll get packed," Carol said briskly. "Can't we take off immediately?"

"The plane is ready and waiting," said Tim. "My paper is providing it, of course—for the syndicate rights to whatever yarn there may be."

Carol nodded and went swiftly out of the room.

Norma watched her go. Then she turned to Tim and said swiftly, almost as though the words came of their own accord. "Don't—don't let her hurt him."

"I'll do my best." Tim said quietly, "but any man who loves that one is going to be hurt plenty! She's as cold as snow and as hard as nails—and as beautiful as sin."

"Part of that she owes to you," said Norma sharply.

"No. Part of it she owes to a lack of discipline when she was young. The proper application of a slipper, held in a strong hand, would have done her more good than anything," stated Tim grimly. "But you could have beaten her to death and disciplined the dickens out of her—and you couldn't have done much about that lump of ice that functions where her heart should be."

Norma was staring at him, wide-eyed, startled by his grimness. And Tim smiled wryly at her expression.

"You see, I got to know her very well while we were on tour," he told her. "A more selfish, more arrogant, more completely hard-boiled scrap of femininity I've seldom encountered. The gal's not even human!"

"You're not being fair—" said Norma, and caught her breath against the sob that threatened her.

Tim put his arm about her. Simply, gently, as a brother might have tried to comfort a grieving child.

"Poor kid, what a tough break all this has been for you!" he said. "But you've kept your chin up and made the best of it. You're nice people, Norma Stewart! Very nice people!"

THE lovely wife of Lieut. Farmer was photographed taking off from the local airport to rejoin her husband on the coast. Photographed again, and interviewed briefly, whenever the plane stopped. Arriving, at last, on the coast and being met by half a dozen men among them army officials who were glad to do some small honor to the wife of the man who had made himself a hero.

There were photographs, too, as Carol entered the hospital. There were no photographs taken inside. Carol offered no protest at this ruling. But Tim, who by now felt he knew her so well, saw the sulky look in her eyes and hoped sardonically that he temper would be controlled until she was back in her hotel room.

No one could guess Carol's thoughts as she was escorted into the hospital. A friendly nurse opened a door and stood back for Carol to enter the small room where a man lay watching the door, with eyes that were hungry and tired of looking upon ugliness and human sufferings.

For a moment Carol stood still just inside the closed door, looking at the bed. This man was a stranger—this man all bandaged and strapped. There were great hollows in his cheeks and his eyes seemed sunken in his head. Carol, who had an almost fanatic hatred for illness and its trappings, felt a little shock of revulsion. She was revolted at the sight of this man who was her husband and who had come back from the dead.

"Sweet!" said Blaine at last. "Please come here, darling. Let me touch you!"

Masking her unwillingness, Carol made herself go to the side of the bed. She let his hand, which was hot and dry and shaking a little, close over her own. She felt the feebleness in that arm and he tried to draw her down to him—and, in spite of herself, she resisted him, her strength not even touched in that resistance.

There was a sound of the doorknob turning, and instantly all the resistance went out of her. She bent lithely, gracefully, above the bed and set her fresh, soft mouth on his dry, fevered lips. Behind them the door opened and a voice said, "Oh—I beg your pardon, Mrs. Farmer."

With a pretty air of confusion, with a mist of tears tangling her long lashes, her hand closing hard over Blaine's, Carol straightened and turned toward the door, where a middle-aged man in a doctor's uniform stood.

"Please come in, doctor," she begged prettily, and her free hand closed over the one that held Blaine's. "You must tell me how soon I can take him home. It's been such a long time—and there's someone at home who wants very much to see him!"

"That young man who hasn't met his father yet," said the doctor. "Young Blaine, Junior, eh?"

"Of course," said Carol happily. "He's the most marvellous baby!"

Blaine lay watching her, a startled look in his eyes. He had missed nothing of the little scene. She had resisted him, as though his touch revolted her. But the moment she was sure of an audience, she was all sweet and wifely and appealing. So much he realized in that little stabbing moment of clarity and pain. The whole scene had been staged for anyone who might have come into the room; anyone—doctor, nurse, or visitor.

He had not been fooled. He had seen the instinctive revulsion toward him; but loyally he tried to tell himself that was because she was young and healthy, and because he was a broken crock of a man. The stabbing pain melted beneath his pity for her.

"Well, that baby's going to have a proud heritage to grow up to," said the doctor heartily. "He's got a mighty fine man for a dad."

CHAPTER XI

—OFFER OF FRIENDSHIP—

CAROL moved closer to Blaine's bedside and her eyes glowed with pride.

"He is pretty wonderful, my husband, isn't he?" she said.

The doctor took the chart that hung from the foot of the bed, examined it and said, nodding in satisfaction. "We grow 'em tough in the army. This fellow's going to be able to leave the hospital for home—and a long convalescent leave that I'm sure he can put to good advantage getting acquainted with that young son of his—within a week or 10 days."

Blaine, watching Carol with eyes sharpened by his love for her, watching her with an intentness that read her as clearly as though her loveliness had been black print on white paper, saw that this was not welcome news to her, and he could not keep the tiny frown from between his eyes. The next moment she was all wide-eyed eagerness and delight; thrilled and enchanted and prattling prettily for the doctor's benefit. Blaine found himself unconsciously dreading the moment when the doctor would leave the room and he would be alone with his lovely wife; the moment toward which all his dreams had yearned so short a while ago. Now he faced the prospect with a sense of discomfort that startled and dismayed him.

But when the doctor had gone, and they were once more alone, Carol said, "Oh, darling, isn't it wonderful that you are coming home soon? The baby is so sweet—of course, Norma has practically taken possession of him. She and Emma scarcely let me see him."

"That's because you've been so ill, sweet—and you're such a child yourself! Seeing you with a baby in your arms—oh, Carol, Carol, I've missed you so." Blaine's voice broke.

"I've missed you, too, darling," she told him. There was something mechanical about her response. As though she read the line from a printed page; not as though it came straight from her heart.

Mutely he begged for her kiss. She bent and brushed his lips with her own, carefully evading his uninjured arm as it would have gone about her and brought her closer to him.

"I mustn't stay long enough to tire you," she said sweetly, managing to be just outside his reach. "I'll run along now. I'll see you again tomorrow."

Then the door closed behind her, leaving him to lie still and white, feeling as though he had dropped into a pit of desolation far blacker and more terrifying than his experience on the stoll had been. The nurse, tiptoeing in, thought he was asleep and went quietly out again.

AS Carol came back down the corridor toward the door of the hospital a nurse stopped her and said:

"Lieut. Farmer's parents are in the reception room, Mrs. Farmer. They asked to see you before you left."

Carol hesitated and her face darkened.

As Carol entered the reception room, Mr. Farmer stood up to greet her. Mrs. Farmer merely looked at her. But it was a look so cold, so expressive of Mrs. Farmer's low opinion of her, that it brought the color to Carol's cheeks and her eyes flashed.

"We wanted you to know, Carol," said Mr. Farmer, "that we have said nothing to Blaine about your behavior."

Carol's head went up and her mouth hardened.

"I suppose you expect me to thank you for that?" she said hotly. "After all, what could you tell him about my behavior?"

"We have no wish to quarrel with you, Carol," Mr. Farmer told her. "You are Blaine's wife and the boy loves you—heaven help him."

Carol said coolly, "That burns you up, doesn't it—that Blaine loves me better than he does you?"

"Frankly, yes—because we know how completely unworthy you are of him," said Mrs. Farmer.

Carol grinned at her, like a wicked street urchin.

"The woman was never born who was worthy of any mother's son—to hear the mother tell it," she drawled.

Mr. Farmer said stiffly, "I've said we don't want to quarrel with you, Carol. We want to be friends, at least outwardly. For Blaine's sake. And I sincerely hope that he need never know about the newspaper and magazine stories and all the rest of it."

"Afraid he can hardly miss it. I've had rather a lot of space, you know," said Carol. "And there are half a dozen magazines due on the stands soon with stories—"

"Blaine wants to go home with you, of course," said Mr. Farmer, ignoring the last part of her speech. "He wants to see the baby—and that's quite natural. But he has promised that as soon as he is able to make the trip, he will bring you and the baby home to us."

"I'm afraid I couldn't agree to that," said Carol firmly. "I don't think it would be wise—feeling the way we do toward each other."

Mrs. Farmer started to say something, but Mr. Farmer's hand on her shoulder cautioned her to silence. He went on in a steady, grave tone: "You need not live with us, of course, though we have a large house and there is plenty of room for you and Blaine and the baby to have your own quarters. You may have an apartment in town, or a bungalow. You may have whatever you like, so long as mother and I are free to see Blaine and the baby. I think even you must admit that we have the right to ask that."

Carol was still for a moment. An apartment in the large industrial city where the Farmer name was one to conjure with; a bungalow, something cute and new and up-to-date; perhaps a really impressive house—no, that would entail too much housekeeping—

"We'll talk it all over before you and Blaine leave for your home," said Mr. Farmer at last, seeing that he had, in a measure, dented her hard self-possession and that she was considering his proposal. "Meanwhile, we will try to keep out of your way while we are here—though Blaine must see us together in his room occasionally, so he will not think we are unfriendly."

"Why not?" Carol agreed. "I dare say we can work something out."

Carol nodded curtly and went out of the room. As she emerged from the hospital, there were two or three cameramen at hand. She posed graciously for pictures and spoke into a newsreel microphone, her voice gay and sweet and caught with excitement. Then she stepped into a taxi and was taken to her hotel.

In her room she jerked off the becoming little black hat that had such a demure, yet intriguing resemblance to a widow's bonnet, and flung it across the room. As she lighted a cigarette, the telephone rang.

"Mrs. Farmer, there is a Mr. Morgan calling," said the desk clerk.

"Send him up, please."

When Tim knocked at the door, Carol perked it open and said sharply, "Well, it's about time you showed up! What sort of a business manager are you anyway?"

Tim stepped into the room and closed the door behind him, eyeing her almost contemptuously. "Good enough to try to protect your reputation, when you seem to think nothing of it," he told her.

She stared at him, startled. "I don't know what you mean."

"I mean that if I had gone with you to the bedside of your husband, as you wanted me to do, there might have been people who wondered a bit, to say the least of it."

Carol ran her fingers through her shining blonde curls, and then absentmindedly picked up a brush from the table and brushed them back to order again.

"Well, there were cameramen outside when I came out, and a man with a microphone who wanted me to 'say a few words' to the dear public. I didn't have the ghost of an idea what to say," she snapped. "I felt like a fool."

"How would you have felt if I'd popped up beside you in full view and in full hearing and said, 'Tell the man you are the happiest girlie in the world,' my pet?" demanded Tim.

She looked at him uncertainly. "I never know when you're poking fun at me, and when you're on the level. That's exactly what I did say, though."

CHAPTER XII

—BLAINE FARMER COMES HOME—

"I'D have bet on it that you would. Still, it's about what a woman in your place would be expected to say—so there's no harm done. Incidentally, I suppose you realize that your husband's return just about finishes your—er—shall we say career?"

"You mean the public won't be interested in me any more?" she demanded.

"I'm afraid not, my pet," answered Tim. "Now that your husband is back, and a greater hero than ever, you will be expected to devote yourself to nursing him back to health. Any other action on your part, my treasure, will get you just as much condemnation as you've been getting praise—or do I make myself clear?"

Carol stood at the window, twisting the curtain cord, her face sullen, all claim to beauty wiped out.

"What about the movie tests you were going to get for me?" she demanded after a moment of unpleasant thought.

"What else do you think the very carefully staged newsreel appearances were?" asked Tim mildly.

Carol flashed around, facing him wide-eyed and furious.

"But those weren't tests—I mean I wasn't acting—" Her voice died beneath the sardonic look in Tim's eyes and the sharp, ugly color rose behind her smooth, clear skin.

"Weren't you?" asked Tim. "Well, you certainly fooled me—"

"Oh, stop being so darned high-and-mighty," she lashed out at him. "You got me into this. You got me to quarrelling with my mother-in-law and father-in-law. I can't go back to being a—a household drudge—"

"Go back?" Tim repeated.

She flung the hairbrush at him. But Tim ducked and the brush knocked a glass bowl from the table, spilling water and flowers.

He regarded her for a long moment with a thoughtful expression, as though he had never seen her before and didn't care if he never saw her again. Then he bent, picked up the broken vase and threw the bits into the wastebasket. He went into the bathroom, brought towels and mopped up the spilled water, and put the roses into the ice-water pitcher.

"Very untidy habit, throwing things," he observed. "I'd say about the best thing you could do now would be to go home and grow up; learn to be real and a lady and, most of all, a human being. I'd say the best person you could find to give you lessons in that would be your sister, Norma. She's quite a person, you know."

Carol's eyes flashed. "Are you in love with her?"

Tim looked straight at her. He seemed to be thinking her question over seriously before he attempted an answer. At last he nodded and said, "Could be."

"Well, it won't do you any good! She's in love with Blaine!" She said it triumphantly, maliciously.

"I know," answered Tim. "I didn't know you knew it, though."

"Of course I knew it. I've known it from the very first!" said Carol swiftly—and then bit her tongue and turned scarlet. Her eyes fell before the look in Tim's eyes.

"I wondered about that," he said at last. "I wondered about something else, too. It was what Bernard Couch said—he's a movie talent scout, you know—when he reported on your tests."

Carol's eyes widened. "Mr. Couch looked at my tests?"

Tim nodded. "He's a pal of mine. I told him I'd found the most beautiful blonde in the country. So he looked at the newsreel shots to see if you rated a regular test—make-up, costumes, lights and all the rest of it."

Carol's eyes were shining. 'And what did he say?" she begged eagerly.

"He said you were beautiful and screened well—but that you had no soul!" answered Tim. "He said there was no depth to you, that you were shallow and selfish and self-centred and probably stubborn—very poor material for the movies."

"What did you tell him about me? You—you must have lied—" blazed Carol, sick with disappointment.

"I didn't have to. The eye of a movie camera is clairvoyant, to anyone who understands its language as well as Bernie Couch."

He turned, picked up his hat and started out of the room.

"Where are you going?" she demanded.

Tim winced and made a little grimace. "Do my ears deceive me—or is there the clank of a ball and chain in that voice?" he asked the atmosphere about them. "I'm going back to my life, my treasure—and leaving you to return to yours. It's been swell knowing you, and we've managed to fill up an awful lot of white space with an awful lot of words. But, after all, you're yesterday's news, my pet—and today's news is clamoring to be written."

Without waiting for her to recover from that, he went out and closed the door behind him.

CAROL was on her good behavior for the rest of the week. She was dutiful, solicitous, devoted to Blaine when there was anyone else in the room. But when the two of them were alone, she was shy and withdrawn, until Blaine, loving her with all his heart, decided that it was because they had been married so briefly and he had been away so long and she had been through such a lot.

Mrs. Farmer, after an hour with him and Carol, would go back to her hotel and cry herself sick because of the hunger in her boy's eyes; because of the eager humility, the pleading of his manner toward Carol.

"I could kill her!" she said furiously one evening.

Mr. Farmer had tried to soothe her. But it was noticeable that he, too, showed the strain by the time Blaine was wheeled from the hospital and into a taxi to the airport.

There he bade good-by to his mother and father, who were taking a later plane for their own home.

"We'll see you soon, son," said Mr. Farmer, gripping his hand firmly. "You and the youngster."

"Of course, dad—just as soon as I get over this trip. A couple of weeks at the latest," Blaine assured him.

Mrs. Farmer tried hard to restrain her tears as she kissed him good-by, and she saw him carried gently into the chartered plane that would take him and Carol home.

To Carol Mrs. Farmer said quietly, "Try to be good to him, Carol. You won't regret it."

Carol looked at her sharply and Mrs. Farmer's eyes met hers. And, as though it had been put into words, Carol knew that Mrs. Farmer was promising to be very generous with money and favors if Carol would be "good" to her husband.

"I will," said Carol coolly. "You may depend on it."

She got into the plane and a moment later it took off.

Blaine held out his hand to Carol, eager and pleading. Carol, with a little shrug put her own into it and sat close to him. She let him talk, pretending to be interested, and tried to hide her boredom and her impatience.

Norma was waiting for them at the airport. She had arranged to have an ambulance meet the plane.

Blaine said to her, his sound hand gripping hers tightly, "Oh, Norma, Norma—it's good to see you again!"

Norma was beyond words, but her free hand covered his and she no longer tried to restrain the tears that slipped down her face. The judge was deeply moved, as were the few very close friends who had been permitted to come to the plane.

"I'll drive the car home, Norma," Carol said curtly. "You can ride in the ambulance with Blaine, if you like."

"I'm such a fool—I'm crying so I can scarcely see," Norma admitted. "Maybe you'd better drive."

Carol nodded, got into the car with her father and drove off, followed by the ambulance, working its way between the thronging friends who clamored for a sight of the town's first hero, and called greetings to him.

As the ambulance drove out off the field and into the road, Blaine said huskily, "It's great to be back again."

Norma smiled at him, but could find no words with which to answer him.

It was when they had brought the wheel chair inside the big living-room, and Emma, her face wet with tears, had brought the tiny bundle that was Blaine's son and laid it in his arms, that Blaine knew the one driving thread of force that had brought him back from death—the need to see this small scrap that was flesh of his flesh and that of the woman he loved.

He looked down at the little face. No longer red and wrinkled like a tiny, angry old man, the baby was beautiful. Its roseleaf skin, the absurd tuft of dark hair, the crumpled starfish hands, the wide eyes as yet unable to focus properly, were so perfect and so wonderful that Blaine felt as though his heart melted within him.

CHAPTER XIII

— BLAINE ASKS QUESTIONS—

FOR the first few days Blaine was so engrossed with the baby that he was scarcely conscious of anything else. He was absorbed in watching everything the baby did. Seeing him in his bath was an outstanding event of the day, though Blaine was quite sure that Emma or Norma would drop the baby and injure him seriously. Finally Emma turned on him in exasperation one day and, with her arms akimbo, said sternly:

"Looky here, Mr. Blaine—y'all's a fine soldier and you fit them Japs grand, and us is proud o' you. But don't come round here tellin' me and Miss Norma about how to bath dis here young-un. Us is experts, ain't us, Miss Norma?"

Norma laughed. "But this is a very unusual baby, Emma. You can't blame Mr. Blaine for being uneasy about him!"

Later, when the bath was finished and the baby had had his bottle and was asleep, Norma wheeled Blaine's chair out on the lawn beneath the friendly shade of a moss-grown live-oak.

"And now—shall I read to you?" she asked. "Or would you rather be alone with the morning paper?"

"If you just had time to talk to me a little?"

Norma dropped down in a wicker chair beside him and said eagerly, "Of course, Blaine. I've always got time to talk to you—or listen to you talk."

Blaine smiled a little wryly. "Thanks for that. I'll probably make the world's most perfect pest of myself a little later, forcing people to listen to me. Right this moment, I want to ask questions."

Norma was startled and suddenly wary. "Questions about what, Blaine?"

"About Carol," answered Blaine, and looked straight at Norma. "Where is she this morning, Norma? Why isn't she taking care of the baby?"

"Any complaints about the way Emma and I are handling that all-important job, mister?"

But Blaine did not smile. "You know better than that," he said instantly. "It's just that—well, she admitted to me in 'Frisco that you and Emma had sort of taken possession of the baby, and that you wouldn't allow her any hand in looking after him."

Norma turned her face away from him. A hot surge of anger burned in her heart. She could understand so well just how Carol had looked, the soft, wistful tone of her voice when she had told Blaine that. And yet, from the very first, Carol had exhibited no emotion except complete indifference toward the baby — except occasionally when her actual dislike of the small, helpless thing shone forth so plainly that Norma had been sickened and infuriated.

"I've hurt you, Norma—and I wouldn't do that for anything in the world," said Blaine, awkward because of his feeling that these things must be said between them and because he could not bear to hurt her. "I know Carol is young, and probably awkward about taking care of the baby. But after all, he is her baby, and she'll never learn to take care of him any earlier. So couldn't you just bear with her youth and inexperience and sort of let her learn?"

"How do you suppose I've learned to take care of him?" demanded Norma, and the next moment could have bitten her tongue out for the implied criticism of Carol.

Blaine put his hand swiftly on hers; a warm, friendly pressure that went straight to her heart and made it jump.

"A woman like you, Norma, is born knowing all the fine and lovely things a woman should know," he said swiftly. "You were born to be a mother, Norma. Carol has to learn!"

NORMA stood up and brushed her skirt free of the clinging petals and moss that had dropped upon her from the old tree overhead.

"Well, Carol shall have her chance to learn—all that Emma has to teach her," said Norma with a lightness that was carefully assumed and not at all convincing. "You know, Emma nursed Carol as a baby. You've heard Carol say that we are too poor to afford Emma, but that we can't discharge her because we owe her too much money—and not altogether money, either. But Carol shall take charge of the baby from now on."

Blaine caught her hand as she would have passed him. "You're not cross with me?"

"Cross? Don't be absurd! How could I be? After all, the baby is yours and Carol's. You'll be taking both of them home to your parents soon, and naturally Carol will have to know how to take care of him. He's a fine baby, but he's fragile. She'll have to be careful of him—"

"Norma, you are so good—I can't ever repay you for a tenth of the things you've done for me—and mine." Turning the hand he held, Blaine put his lips to the palm in a gesture of such humility that the tears stung Norma's eyes and she could not speak. She wrenched her hand free of his clasp and went running back to the house.

As he reached the front door Carol was coming down the stairs, looking exquisitely fresh and dainty in a flowered cotton frock that was as young as the spring morning. In her hand she carried a cartwheel hat of white straw with a spray of pale green ivy leaves appliqued about its brim.

"Going out?" asked Norma.

"Naturally. Did you think I was going to browse at home all day?"

"Your husband seems a bit concerned because Emma and I have denied you the privilege of taking care of your own child," Norma informed her, more sharply than she had spoken to Carol in a long time.

Carol smiled faintly. "My esteemed husband can be a bit of a bore, don't you think? And without half trying."

"Did you tell him that Emma and I wouldn't allow you to tend the baby?" demanded Norma.

Carol shrugged. "Oh, I might have given that impression. If I'm going to have to go and live with the twin horrors of his mother and father, I might as well get off on the right foot. If I don't know anything about looking after the infant, and can claim it was your possessive jealousy—well, they can do no less than hire a really competent nursemaid — and without blaming me too much, don't you think?"

Norma drew a long, hard breath and made herself relax the grip of her hands that had been clenched until the knuckles were white.

"Sometimes I wonder, Carol, if you have any heart at all," she said when she could force herself to speak calmly.

Carol swung her wide-brimmed hat in a white-gloved hand and smiled derisively at her sister, her eyes cool and speculative.

"Oh, I imagine I have something that serves the same purpose," she drawled. "But, thank heaven, I have none of that wild emotional upheaval that people sometimes speak of so highly as 'human feeling.' If, by a heart, you mean do I get myself all tangled up emotionally the way you do—falling in love with your brother-in-law and adoring his infant and knowing that you can never have either of them for your own—then I have no heart, thank goodness! It must be a very uncomfortable possession."

She brushed by Norma and went on out into the brilliant spring sunshine. Norma stood for a moment leaning against the stair-railing, her face in her hands, her heart sick within her. Sick with pity for Blaine Farmer, and for the baby upstairs.

CHAPTER XIV

—MORGAN PROPOSES—

A FEW days later Norma was in the garden at the back of the big, rambling old house. The garden was a very pleasant place on this warm, blue and golden morning.

She was on her knees gathering strawberries when she heard a footstep on the path and looked up—into Tim Morgan's face.

"I've seen a lot of gardens in my time," said Tim before she could master her surprise to speak to him. "But they never seemed complete, no matter how handsome they were. I know now what was wroing. You were not in any of them. That's why this is the most beautiful garden I've ever seen."

Norma said, "I don't suppose I dare ask what brought you here? Not another story, I hope?"

Tim chuckled. "A warm-hearted, eager welcome, I must say," he answered her, and looked swiftly about him. At the far end of the garden an old white bench sat beneath the shining glory of the sweet peas. An orange tree offered shade and shelter from eyes from the house.

"I came to talk to you," he informed her as he drew her with him along the path to the bench. "Here, sit down. I've got a lot to say—and you may as well listen now as later."

"It's not a story?" hazarded Norma uneasily.

"It's not a story," said Tim. "I'm here in my unofficial capacity as Timothy Morgan, a guy who can't get a certain gal out of his mind and who insists on being heard on the subject of whether the gal is interested or not."

"Oh, Tim!"

Tim's jaw hardened a little but his eyes met hers straightly.

"And that alone should be enough to tip me off to the utter folly of going any further with what I have to say," he admitted. "But it may be the only chance I'll ever have—so here we go. I've applied for duty abroad—foreign correspondent. The army, the navy and the marines won't have me. It seems I have two left feet, or something. Anyway, I couldn't pass the physical examination—but the newspaper syndicate doesn't mind whether I have two left feet or none, so long as I can get the stories back. And I'm going to do that or die in the attempt. But first, I wanted to tell you that I love you—although I don't suppose there's one chance in a million that you could care anything for me, is there?"

Norma was still, her lower lip caught hard between her teeth, trying to steady herself so she could answer him without bursting into tears.

Tim nodded, and now his jaw was set so hard that a little ridge of bunched muscle stood out clearly against it, and the look in his eyes was so bleak that Norma almost cried out with pain at the sight of it.

"Well, that's that," said Tim at last. "I should have known it, of course. A guy who never had a real break in his life, expecting lightning to strike him all at once so that a girl like you could love him—I had a nerve, didn't I?"

"Oh, Tim, I won't let you belittle yourself. Any girl would be the luckiest girl in the world if you loved her—" Norma stammered.

"Well, for the luckiest girl in the world, I'd say you were not very happy looking," observed Tim.

"I'm terribly sorry, Tim—"

"Sure, sure—I know," said Tim, as though that didn't really matter. "I suppose it's still Farmer, eh?"

Norma caught her breath and the color washed over her face and was gone, leaving it whiter even than the collar of her dress.

"Thanks for not trying to lie about it," said Tim, when she could not answer him. Then, with a sudden violent emotion, he snapped, "Norma, can't you snap out of it? Don't you know you haven't a chance in a million of ever meaning anything to him? Don't you know that sister of yours has her hooks into him so deep that, no matter what happens, he'll never have eyes or heart for anybody else?"

"Yes," said Norma huskily. "I know all that."

"And you still love him."

"There doesn't seem to be anything I can do about it."

"Even if you wanted to—which, of course, you don't," finished Tim drily. "I should know how it feels. I have known from the first that I loved you—and that it was completely hopeless, and that there was nothing I could do about it. But I've just gone on loving you and hoping, like the blind fool I am, that miracles still existed and you might change your mind and discover you liked having me around."

HE looked so disheartened that Norma said, the tears thick in her voice, "Oh, Tim, I'm so sorry—"

Tim turned on her almost savagely. "For Pete's sake, will you stop being sorry for me?" he raged. "I've still got an ounce or two of pride left—but it's not being helped any by your sitting here yapping that you are sorry you can't love me! So stop it, will you?"

"I'm—sorry," stammered Norma, and shrank a little from him, her face white, her eyes wide.

Tim studied her from the top of her chestnut curls to the tips of her small scuffed slippers, and there was a curious look in his eyes.

"I'm hanged if I can understand it," he said at last. "You're not a raving beauty."

"Far from it," Norma admitted.

"You're not especially brilliant."

"I couldn't be less so."

"You're not sophisticated, or smooth, or a woman of the world."

"Indeed I'm not!" She was still quite honest, completely unresentful of his summing up.

"In fact you're a simple, unassuming, unaffected, small-town girl — domestic to the tips of your fingers. You're the kind that puts out roots wherever you stay more than a week, and life as the wife of a foreign correspondent would be misery for you. Knowing you were unhappy would affect my work and my health and my peace of mind—yet, I love you and I want to marry you! It that a crazy business—or isn't it?"

"I'm afraid it's very crazy. But maybe you're mistaken," Norma suggested hopefully.

"Mistaken?"

"About wanting me," she explained. "Maybe it's just that I'm one of the very few you couldn't get. You've found something you can't have—and you suddenly discover you want it terribly. By the time you're been abroad a week, you'll have forgotten all about me—"

"And do I hope you're right!" said Tim.

"I'm sure I am," said Norma earnestly.

Tim said huskily. "You infuriating, adorable little nitwit." He took her firmly into his arms, held her close and hard against him and kissed her. When he released her, his face was pale and set again and he shook his head.

"I may forget you—mind, I say I may!" he warned her. "But it seems at the moment highly unlikely. I'll be back when this war is over. If you're still free, I'll marry you whether you like it or not."

Norma said shakily, halfway between tears and laughter, "This is certainly an original proposal."

"It was meant to be," said Tim. He was looking for his hat where he had tossed it into a bed of California poppies. When he had retrieved it he turned to her and said, "So all right—if I come back—darn you, I'll haunt you the rest of your life!"

Without waiting for her to answer, he turned and stalked out of the garden, moving swiftly, his back very straight.

Not until the gate clicked shut behind him did Norma draw a long breath and force herself to relax a little. She had been badly shaken; she had been forced to believe that Tim was in deadly earnest. He loved her; he wanted to marry her. And because she knew so well the acid-deep burning of thwarted love her heart was sick with pity for him.

CHAPTER XV

—TWO LETTERS FROM CAROL—

SHE had finished gathering the vegetables for lunch when she heard Carol calling her, and the two met at the garden gate. Carol had been in town shopping, or killing time as usual; and now she was flushed and bright-eyed.

"Where is he?" she demanded almost before she came close enough for Norma to hear her. "Emma said Mr. Morgan was here—"

He lunged forward to snatch the letter from her, and she sprang backward, trying to hold the flaming paper out of his reach.

"He's gone," answered Norma.

Carol's face hardened and her eyes grew dark with anger and suspicion. "You sent him away. He came to see me—"

"He didn't, Carol. He came to see me—"

"That's a lie!" flamed Carol. "He came to see me—and you sent him away. You're jealous. You can't bear it if a man likes me better than you. You're jealous and spiteful—"

Her voice was rising hysterically. Norma caught her arm and shook her hard.

"Carol, control yourself! If you must know, Tim Morgan came to see me—to ask me to marry him."

"I don't believe you!" raged Carol, but there was a frightened look in her eyes.

"It's true, Carol. He told me he loved me while you were still in the hospital, the first time he came to town—"

"Now I know you're lying. Why, he scarcely knew you."

"I'm afraid you'll have to believe me, Carol, whether you want to or not," said Norma. "He has asked for foreign service and his syndicate is sending him abroad—"

"To the war?" asked Carol fearfully.

"Of course. He tried to enlist and couldn't pass the physical examinations."

Carol stood still for a long moment, and then she flung up her head and jerked away from Norma.

"Carol, where are you going?" Norma cried sharply.

"I've got to see him, Norma. I've g-got to," sobbed Carol, and fled before Norma could stop her. A moment later Norma heard the sound of the car, and then silence.

Troubled and uneasy, Norma went on into the house.

"Where is Lieut. Farmer, Emma?" asked Norma.

"Some o' dem officers from de camp done come and got him," answered Emma. "Dey say he won't be back fo' lunch."

Norma nodded and turned toward the door.

"You reckon Miss Carol be back fo' lunch?" asked Emma.

Norma looked at her swiftly. There was very little that went on around the house that Emma didn't know about. But her discretion was perfect and Norma knew she could be trusted implicitly. The Stewarts were Emma's family, and Emma would fight for them to the last beat of her simple, devoted heart.

"I don't think so, Emma," said Norma at last. "You and I will just have a snack."

"Yessum," said Emma. And then suddenly, as though the words came of their own volition, she said eagerly, "Honey don't you worry 'bout Miss Carol. Ain't nothin' bad the matter with Miss Carol. She just young and flighty, but nothin' but time an' de good Lawd can change that. She'll straighten out all right soon as Mr. Blaine gits to where he can make her step. Ain't nothin' to straighten out a flighty gal like a husband dat don't stand fo' no foolishness. And dat's de kind of gen'leman Mr. Blaine is! So—you just set tight, Miss Norma; honey—and don't you be wearyin' yourself about things dat de good Lawd's tendin' to."

Norma smiled and hugged Emma's ample shoulders. "Thanks for the pep talk, Emma. I guess I needed it."

"Yessum," said Emma modestly. "I reckon you did."

Afterward, Norma blamed herself bitterly that she had not stayed home that afternoon. But she had promised to attend a meeting of one of her war work committees and Emma was entirely competent to take care of the baby. So Norma had gone.

It was after 4 when she came home to find Emma waiting for her anxiously, deeply worried.

"Dat Miss Carol come home 'bout an hour ago," she reported. "And de first thing I knowed she was packin' like a crazy woman. I tried to stop her. She called me a meddlin' old black fool. Miss Norma."

"She didn't really mean it. Where is she?"

"I dunno, Miss Norma," answered Emma, and held out an envelope across which Norma's name was written in Carol's splashy handwriting. "She said fo' me to give you dis an' you'd know what to do."

Norma's heart seemed to freeze as she took the bulky envelope and, with shaking fingers, ripped it open. Inside there was another envelope addressed to Blaine. There was also a sheet of the thick, creamy paper that Carol used. Norma's eyes blurred as she tried to focus them on the writing.

"Norma:

"I've had enough—more than enough. If I stay around Blaine Farmer and that idiot child of his I'll murder the two of them. I'm going away with Tim, and there's nothing any of you can do to stop me! So save us all a lot of bother and scandal by not trying. I've left a note for Blaine. I've told him the truth and it will probably shock him to tears. Maybe when the shock wears off he'll have the brains to discover that he should have married you in the first place, not me. But that's something that can be easily remedied. He can divorce me like a breeze—and that'll be just dandy. Tim will marry me and we'll all have fun. Good-by and good luck!

"CAROL"

The sheer cruelty of the letter was like a blow. Norma could not make herself believe that Carol had written such a ghastly letter; not even in the light of Carol's behavior in the last few months.

Emma was watching Norma anxiously and she asked after a moment, "What do it say, honey?"

"I can't believe it! Oh, Emma, she can't do this—not to Blaine! Not to the baby!"

Emma's black face was set and her eyes were hard.

"Yessum, she could. The devil done moved into Miss Carol's heart. She's a witch woman!"

Norma turned Blaine's letter over in her hands. It was unsealed. It was quite obvious that Carol had meant for her to read it. After a moment, shrinking with distaste, Norma took the letter out of the envelope and opened it, almost as though it had been some deadly thing that she expected to strike at her. Carol had begun without even having the sorry grace to mention her husband by name:

"I don't love you. I never did, really. "I thought it would be fun being Mrs. Blaine Farmer, and living in a decent town and going places. But I won't stay married to a cripple and I won't be tied down to a baby and mixing his formula. You should have married Norma—but there's still time for that. Divorce me as quickly as you can—and forget I ever lived."

Norma was shaking with sick loathing as she finished the note. Emma caught her as she swayed a little and put her into her chair. Emma could neither read nor write, and for the moment Norma was glad of it. She felt she could not have borne it if anyone else had seen those two horrible letters.

Blaine! Her heart cried out against the thought of his seeing the letters; of having him know the things that had burned in Carol's heart. It was unthinkable that Carol could have written them. Emma had said she had been like a crazy woman. Norma, reading these dreadful letters, could easily believe that.

Tim! Carol had gone with Tim! Tim could do this to her—Norma! Only this morning he had told her he loved her; that she was the only woman he had ever even thought of wanting to marry; and that if she didn't marry him, he would have no other woman. Yet he could do a shameful trick like this to her. Carol did not love Tim; and Norma knew that Tim had an uncomfortably clear understanding of Carol and could not believe that he loved her.

She put the anxious, worried Emma aside after a moment and said, "I'm all right, Emma. I've got to use the telephone."

She called the hotel first and, steadying her voice with a terrific effort, she asked for Mr. Timothy Morgan.

"He checked out around noon," answered the desk clerk.

"Around noon?" Norma repeated.

"He said he was taking the 12.47 to New York."

Norma put down the telephone and sat still for a moment. Emma had said that Carol had come home about 4. She had not gone with Tim, then. But before that thought could comfort Norma, she reminded herself that in all probability Tim and Carol planned to meet somewhere.

While she still sat holding the telephone, it rang sharply.

"Hello—is that you, Norma?" came a voice that she had difficulty in recognizing. "This is Madge Anstey at the hospital. Brace yourself, darling—I've got some bad news for you."

Norma sat very still for a moment until the hammers stopped banging in her head and she could force words from her dry lips. Then she whispered, "Yes?"

"It's about Carol, Norma," said Madge Anstey gently.

Norma went rigid and her hand that held the telephone clenched until her whole arm ached with the strain.

"I—yes?" she said so faintly that Madge Anstey could scarcely catch the words.

"She's been in a smash-up, Norma," said Madge gently. "I'm afraid it's pretty bad—"

"She's—dead?" asked Norma, sensing instantly the whole truth behind Madge's attempt at gentleness.

"Yes, darling. I'm terribly sorry, Norma—"

"Yes, of course you are. I'll—I'll be right over," stammered Norma.

"I'll send a taxi, darling—" Madge's voice broke.

Norma sat very still with the dead telephone in her hand. Emma, hovering anxiously, gave a little scream at the sight of Norma's face.

"De Lawd have mercy, Miss Norma—what's de matter?" she wailed.

Norma lifted tragic eyes that seemed enormous in the white mask of her face. "Carol's—dead," she said very softly.

Emma reeled a little and, flinging her apron over her head, began to sob. Norma looked at her strangely and then down at the letters still crumpled in her hand.

"Blaine needn't ever know about the letters, Emma. That's one agony he can escape."

CHAPTER XVI

—LIFE WITHOUT CAROL—

NORMA never remembered the next few days very clearly. They were agonizing days; heartbreaking days. Carol drove too fast and too recklessly, so that no one was surprised when she was pulled from the wreckage of the little car and brought to the hospital with her slim body so crumpled and twisted that she had lived only a few minutes.

She had been alone in the car. So much Norma learned from Madge Anstley that first difficult afternoon. Nor had there been any luggage to attest to the fact that she had been running away. Her bags were strapped and packed in her room, ready to be forwarded to her when she had caught up with Tim and would know where to have them sent.

When Norma and her father and Blaine came back from the hospital that night, the packed suitcases had been relieved of their contents and put out of sight. Carol's room looked exactly as it had looked for months; fresh and dainty, her silver toilet things scattered on the dressing table.

Norma, coming fearfully to remove any traces that would lead Blaine to suspect the ugly truth, looked at Emma with swimming eyes and Emma said, "Dey wan't no use of po' Mr. Blaine knowin' she was runnin' away. Don't nobody know it but yo' and me, Miss Norma—and dey ain't nobody ever got to know."

"Oh, Emma," cried Norma, and was folded in the devoted arms that had soothed her small griefs and heartaches when she had been just a child.

"She was de prettiest li'l baby—she sho' was, Miss Norma," said Emma, her tears mingling with Norma's.

NORMA burned the cruel letter that had been left for her. Burned it secretly in her own room, above a bronze ashtray, and stirred the ashes to powder. She started to dispose of the letter for Blaine the same way—but there was a queer feeling, as though suddenly a small, cold hand lay against her wrist, restraining her. It was an absurd feeling. She tried to fight it off, but at last she knew she could not destroy the letter. Some instinct, some mysterious power, seemed to forbid it. And so at last she locked it away in a small cedar chest that held gloves and handkerchiefs. Locked it away and put the key in an old jewel case that had belonged to her mother. And tried not to feel as though a deadly reptile lay coiled beneath those innocent handkerchiefs and gloves.

"When I'm more nearly myself, I'll get it out and destroy it," she resolved. And knew that it would be a long time before she would have the courage.

Blaine had taken his wife's death as a blow that had rocked him to the very foundations of his being. It was a blow from which he found it difficult to rally. He spoke of her often and tenderly. Norma realized in the first week or two that the shock of losing Carol had completely wiped out any memory of unhappiness, of unkindness or coldness, that she had left him. He remembered only her beauty, her gaiety and charm; the delight he had known in her; the warm, eager pride in her as his wife.

Norma, the words in that brutal letter burning like acid in her heart, had to clench her teeth and hold herself rigid to keep from betraying herself before him. There was no thought in her mind of forgiving Carol. It did not occur to her that Carol would have wanted her forgiveness. As always, Carol had done exactly what she pleased and had come a cropper. But Carol would have been the last to admit her fault, or that she needed or desired forgiveness.

Mr. and Mrs. Farmer had come for the funeral. They had been cool and polite to Norma and the judge. They had been frantic to take their son and the baby home with them, and have done with these Stewarts once and for all. But Blaine would not listen.

"I can't go away and leave her here, mother." Blaine had said once when Mrs. Farmer had pleaded with him. "Somehow, here in this house where she was born and grew up and where we were married, there seems to be something of her still left. It comforts me a little to look at the things she saw; to touch the walls that sheltered her. I can't give all that up, mother. I can't!"

"But, Blaine, darling—this isn't your home—"

"It is now, mother."

Mrs. Farmer looked at him, startled. "What on earth do you mean, son?"

"I mean that I've started reading law with the judge. Just as a hobby, and in case the war is over before I get on my feet again—and I pray it will be. This town has been good to me. I like it. I feel at home here. It's the sort of town I want my son to grow up in."

"But what about your father and me?" protested Mrs. Farmer.

Blaine put his arms about her and held her close.

"Just try to be a little patient with me," he begged her. "I'll break away some day. It can't be right away. It may be after I go back into the service—but not right away, mom. I can't leave her. I can't!"

He buried his face in his hands and she saw his shoulders heave a little. She was bitterly disappointed that he should prefer the home of people she disliked to that of the home that was his own. But when she tried to explain to her husband, he put his arm about her shoulders and said tenderly, "Don't plague the boy now, mother. He's been through a lot—his spirit's raw and tender. It's got to have time to heal. We'll have him back with us some day—he and Little Scrapper, both."

So the Farmers went home, and Norma and Emma tried hard to keep the big old house as cheerful a place as possible for the men.

Blaine worshipped the baby. He spent long hours sitting beside him in the nursery, or with his chair and the baby's carriage side by side on the shady lawn, while the baby slept and Blaine sat and dreamed above him.

Each day Blaine was growing stronger. The day he graduated from the wheel chair to crutches was a gala day in the house. And because he was young and healthy it was not long after that until only one crutch was necessary. Eventually a stout cane made it possible for him to get about slowly but with increasing strength and confidence.

CHAPTER XVII

—A FIGHT FOR LIFE—

THERE was a night, then, when Norma awakened at 2 o'clock for the baby's regular feeding. She slid into a warm robe, thrust her feet into her slippers and, so accustomed was she to the task, that she was scarcely awake as she went into the nursery and prepared the electric hotplate, the water in which to warm the bottle.

As she bent over the baby's crib horror clutched her. The tiny face was convulsed and blue, and the faint breath was rasping and terrifying.

Emma had been sleeping in the small room off the kitchen since Carol's death, so that if she were needed in the night Norman would not have to go down to her cabin for her.

With cold fingers clutching at her heart, Norma fled to summon Emma, and Emma took one look at the baby.

"Croup, honey—git de steam kittle ready an' call de doctor," she ordered swiftly, lifting the baby with gentle, competent hands.

By the time the doctor arrived, the judge and Blaine were up and dressed. The doctor dismissed them from the room, made a swift examination of the baby, and said the one word that Norma had dreaded since the moment she had looked at that small, bluish face.

"Diphtheria," he said. "There's a lot of it around town."

"Diphtheria? Oh, Dr. Andrews—but he's so tiny."

"He'll have a tough time of it," admitted Dr. Andrews with a brusqueness that hid his genuine feeling. "Poor little fellow! It's not bad enough for a guy to lose his mother. He's got to have something like this."

The baby began to wail a little, whimpering like a small puppy. Norma watched as the doctor put a tube into the tiny throat to ease the congestion.

"I don't know whether you'll be able to get a nurse," said Dr. Andrews at last when the baby seemed more comfortable. "There's a lot of sickness around—flu and the like."

"What us want wid a nurse?" demanded Emma almost belligerently. "Me an' Miss Norma'll take care of our child."

Dr. Andrews nodded. "I guess you can at that."

Dr. Andrews detailed the instructions carefully, and Norma took notes so that she and Emma would be prepared for almost any emergency. He left a prescription and promised to return in the morning. And the Stewart household settled down for its fight against the enemy that threatened its smallest and most helpless member.

Blaine grew white and strained and haggard. The judge aged visibly. He adored his small grandson, and Carol's death had hit him hard. But Norma went about the grim business of fighting the baby's battle with outward composure.

There were dark days when it seemed impossible that the tiny thing could cling to its frail hold on life.

There was a night when Dr. Andrews came at 8, looked long at the baby, and said quietly, "I'll be back about midnight, Norma."

Norma knew that now was the crisis. The next few hours would tell the tale. It seemed to her that the hours were each a day long. She sat beside the crib, feeling as though she could pour some of her own strength into the tiny body. She thought there could be nothing in the world as pathetic as a sick baby fighting for its life; so helpless, so dependent, seeming to plead to grown-ups for strength and wisdom with which to fight. And she thought there could be nothing more bitter than the utter helplessness of the grown-up to meet that pathetic demand. . . .

DR. ANDREWS came back at midnight. He made himself comfortable beside the crib and Norma's heart failed her. She had known him almost all her life. He was a treasured friend. She knew he would be honest with her; mercifully, brutally honest. But she dared not put into words the question that tortured her.

She looked at Dr. Andrews, mutely pleading for reassurance. But he only said heavily, "The next few hours will decide."

It was almost dawn when the doctor's trained eyes saw what Norma's, dulled with fatigue and despair, had not seen. That the faint bluish shadow at the tiny temples was fading a little; that the small waxen face was taking on the faintest possible semblance to life. It was a change so gradual that only a man of Dr Andrews' skill and his years of loving service to humanity might have seen it.

Norma saw him move suddenly and jerked herself erect, her hands clammy, her eyes wide in her pallid face.

Dr. Andrews bent over the baby, the thermometer in the tiny mouth, his fingers slipping gently inside the neck of the little sleeping garment. When he looked at the markings on the thermometer he nodded to Norma and his tired face was alight.

"Fever's down a bit. I think the little guy will make it now," he said, and though his voice was low-pitched, it rang with a note of triumph that every doctor knows when he has won a battle against odds that seemed almost insurmountable.

"May I—may I tell father and Blaine?" Norma whispered.

"Of course—come along. We'll both tell 'em. Emma can carry on here. You've got to get some sleep, or I'll have you on my hands next!" said Dr. Andrews, steadying her as they moved down the stairs.

Inside the living-room Blaine and the judge sat like two men who awaited the executioner. Blaine lifted a tortured face. Norma said unsteadily, "It's all right, Blaine—he's passed the crisis—" Tears swept over her, and she couldn't finish.

Blaine hid his face in his hands and a prayer of thanks came from the depths of his heart.

"I think we could all use a couple of cups of coffee," said the judge thickly. Even as he left the room Norma saw the traces of tears in his eyes.

Dr. Andrews spoke to Blaine.

"Barring any unforeseen complications, which we will do everything in our power to guard against, of course, lieutenant, your young man's going to get along splendidly," he said heartily. "But I suppose you just about owe his life to this girl's devoted nursing. I think she willed the little fellow to get well—and that did him as much good as my medicine. She's a great girl, lieutenant—one of the best."

"I've known that for a long time, doctor," Blaine said huskily.

"Well, never forget it, my boy! If it hadn't been for her—" Dr. Andrews shook his head to complete the sentence as the judge came in with a tray on which were cups of coffee Emma had made every few hours since midnight.

"I won't!" said Blaine, gripping Norma's hand so hard that she all but winced with the pain.

Dr. Andrews said good-night and the judge went with him to the door. Norma sat very still, tense. If only, now that they were alone, Blaine would reveal some feeling for her — for Norma Stewart, not for his sister-in-law, to whom he was passionately grateful. She was hungry for some indication of his affection for herself. She was tired beyond physical endurance, almost. The reaction from the age-long days and nights of frantic anxiety and emotional stress had left her drained of any feeling save this powerful need, this desperate hunger for some mark of Blaine's feeling for her as a woman—not merely as a nurse for his child.

Blaine stood looking down at her with a look in his eyes that for a moment stirred her heart with hope.

Suddenly he knelt beside her, her two hands held close in both his own. She was dimly conscious of the roughness of those hands, worn and stained and neglected in the devoted nursing of the baby.

Blaine turned her hands until they lay palm up. Then he bent his head and set his mouth against a little stain the baby's medicine had made.

"I can never thank you enough, Norma," he said huskily. "There aren't any words to tell you how I feel. You've given him back to me—my little son! Carol's gift to me—the last thing she ever gave me! Her legacy to me—"

For a moment Norma was still. There was a roaring in her ears. She knew a terrible surge of wild, reasonless anger that lifted her to her feet, that jerked her hands from his, that flung her head back so that she looked straight into his startled eyes. A little grimace of pain pulled her lips apart so that her white teeth gleamed and her voice was harsh as she flung the words at him savagely: "Oh, no—Buddy's not the last thing she left you! She left you a letter—"

The next instant she would have given her very life if she could have caught back those words. All bitterness and jealousy poured out of her, and her knees were weak and trembling. But it was too late.

Blaine's white face grew sharp, his eyes blazed.

"Carol left me a letter?" he repeated. "Where is it? You've kept it from me? You've dared do that?"

"Oh, no, Blaine! I didn't know what I was saying. Forget it—" she wailed like a stricken child, and would have turned away from him.

But Blaine caught her arm. Now his eyes were black with anger.

"Give me my letter!" he ordered.

"No! No! There isn't any letter," she sobbed, the fingers of her free hand plucking at his painful grasp on her other wrist. "Blaine, you're hurting me! Blaine, let me go—let me go—"

"Not until you've given me that letter, Norma. I'll tear this place apart, piece by piece, until I find it. I'll hate you the longest day I live if you don't give it to me!" He was beside himself, and the judge, at the door, looked on, bewildered and alarmed at the ugly scene.

"Let me go!" Norma sobbed.

"Blaine—what is all this? Can't you see you're hurting her?" snapped the judge.

Blaine released Norma's wrist and turned on the judge.

"Did you know about this, sir?" he demanded.

"About what?"

"About the letter Carol left me—and that Norma has never given me!"

"Is this true, Norma? Is there a letter?" demanded the judge.

"No—no—of course not," cried Norma wildly.

"She's lying, sir—you can see that," accused Blaine. "There is a letter, and I intend to have it—no matter what it costs, sir!"

"I'll never give it to you—never—never," Norma said. "I've burned it up!"

CHAPTER XVIII

—BLAINE GETS HIS LETTER—

BEFORE they could stop her, she ran from the room and stumbled up the stairs. As she reached the top of the stairs, she knew that Blaine was behind her. If she had been less strained, less overwrought and harried, she might have behaved differently. But her only thought now was that the letter must be destroyed without an instant's delay.

She had the letter in her hand, was applying a light to it, when Blaine sprang through the doorway.

She heard his angry cry as he saw what she was doing. He lunged forward to snatch the letter from her, and she sprang backward, trying to hold the flaming letter out of his reach. As she moved sharply backward, her heel caught in the rug and she slipped, tried to save herself. The letter slipped from her shaking hand and she fell backward heavily, striking her head on the corner of the dressing-table. A merciful blackness swept over her and she felt as though she were sinking into a deep, dark pit; sinking gladly, willingly, into the rest she so desperately needed.

She came slowly back to consciousness. She had been far away to a strange place, among strange people. As she fought her way back, she heard voices that seemed very far away. Somebody was talking very fast and very feebly. Somebody who chattered and laughed and had a voice that made her writhe uncomfortably.

And then she knew that the voice was her own because, as her senses cleared a little, the voice stopped and she opened her eyes and looked about her. She was in her own room and the sun was flooding through the open windows. She stirred a little and that anxious, harried voice began again. Suddenly a hand closed over hers and a man's voice, broken and husky, said, "Oh, darling—darling—stop it! I can't listen to any more! I can't! I've been punished enough. Come back to me, Norma, come back to me."

Startled, her eyes flew wide and she looked into Blaine's white, tortured face and eyes that were sick with misery.

"Why—you're Blaine," she whispered on a little note of wonder. "I thought you'd gone."

"Never, Norma. I couldn't go away while you were so ill." He tried desperately to smile at her, though his haggard face made the smile little more than a travesty.

She lifted her free hand and touched his cheek. "I've been ill? So have you—you look terrible!"

Blaine's grin deepened ever so little. "Well, no doubt a shave and a few hours' sleep would help—but you've kept us all in such an uproar these last few weeks that none of us has slept very much!" he admitted.

"Few weeks? You mean I've been ill for weeks?" Norma gasped.

"Nearly three of them," answered Blaine, and kissed her hand. "You just about scared us to death—"

Memory came back to her and she stammered, "Oh, Blaine—that awful letter—did I burn it?"

"No, Norma — thank heaven, you didn't!"

"Oh, Blaine, I didn't want you to be hurt."

"Then you should have given me the letter at the very last, Norma. It was a shock I needed to set me straight. I might have gone on the rest of my life idealizing a girl I now know never really existed. Does that shock you, Norma?"

"No, I don't think it does. Only—don't judge her too narshly, Blaine."

"I couldn't do that. After all, she was Buddy's mother and I loved her dearly," answered Blaine steadily. "I believe, at first, that she cared a little for me. Man's a stupid animal, isn't he, Norma? He can't believe that the woman he loves doesn't care a little for him—no matter how brutally plain she tries to make it that she doesn't."

Norma frowned a little in her effort at concentration.

"I think Carol cared for you as much as it was possible for her to care for anybody," she told him quite honestly. "There seemed something left out of Carol's nature. She seemed completely cold—completely lacking in emotion—"

Blaine covered her hand with his and said gently:

"You mustn't talk any more, Norma. You've been very ill. We were afraid for a while it was concussion—and you were so overtired and under such a terrific strain, something simply had to snap. But you're going to be all right now. All you need is complete rest, and that's what you're going to have, if all of us have to stand over you—"

"The baby?" Norma stammered on a sudden stab of memory.

"The baby is fat and sassy and thriving, the little rascal!" said Blaine, his voice glowing with pride. "You never saw such stamina. He's quite a youngster!"

Norma gave a deep sigh and relaxed among her pillows.

"Then I can rest—if Buddy's all right," she said drowsily.

"And no more delirium, you hear?" said Blaine sternly, though his eyes were warm and tender.

A little tide of color surged over her face. "Did—did I talk my head off?" she stammered, abashed at the thought.

"You did! And with every word I felt a little more like a worm—and saw how blind and cruel I had been. But we're not going to talk about that any more, remember? You're going to sleep now—definitely!"

She smiled at him drowsily and was almost instantly asleep. From that moment on her recovery began. She slept for hours; she awoke to be fed and bathed and tended with Emma's sheltering love.

The judge came in to sit with her, to smile at her and to try to hide the fact that he had been almost out of his mind during her illness. When she grew a little stronger, she discovered that Mr. and Mrs. Farmer had arrived a few days after her collapse and were still there.

Mrs. Farmer came in one afternoon when Emma had finished brushing Norma's shining hair and getting her into a pretty bed jacket.

"Dat Miz Farmer done brung you dis," Emma reported as she put the mist of maize-yellow satin and lace about Norma's thin shoulders. "She say if yo'all feels like it, she'd like to come in and visit with yo' a spell."

"Of course—please ask her to," answered Norma, trying not to wince at the thought.

CHAPTER XIX

—"COME BACK—SOME DAY"—

MRS. FARMER came in, a little hesitant, not as sure of herself as formerly. Her face was not quite so plump and her eyes were worried.

"My dear, I can't tell you how sorry I am that you have been so ill," she said.

Norma smiled at her and said, with a wink:

"Sh-h-h! We mustn't let the menfolks know it—but how else is a woman to get a rest now and then?"

Mrs. Farmer smiled and relaxed. "I'm so glad you're feeling better. You mustn't let me upset you," she said.

"Of course not. I'm sorry I wasn't up to receive you and try to make your visit pleasant."

"We came because you were ill and we thought perhaps our being here might relieve your maid of some of the work of looking after the baby and running the house," explained Mrs. Farmer. "She's a marvellous nurse—in fact, a remarkable woman."

"There's only one Emma—and aren't father and I lucky that she loves us enough to put up with us?" said Norma.

Mrs. Farmer said eagerly, "May we talk about your sister a moment? I mean—it wouldn't upset you too much?"

Norma's hands clenched a little in the bedclothes, but she met Mrs. Farmer's gaze straightly and answered:

"I shall be very happy to talk about Carol. I know that to you she must have seemed some sort of monster. But it wasn't altogether her fault, you know. My father and I spoiled her dreadfully—"

Mrs. Farmer's hand covered one of Norma's and she said gently, "Of course, my dear—and I am not judging your sister at all. I can't, somehow, feel that I am perfect enough to sit in judgment on other people—especially young girls with what they call a 'modern' outlook. You see, Blaine told me about your sister's letter."

"I gathered as much."

"Please don't think that my husband and I feel any bitterness. After all, the past is done with and no good ever comes of trying to rake it up again," said Mrs. Farmer. "What I wanted to say is—well, now that you are convalescent. I am sure that the baby must add greatly to the work your servant does. I was wondering—"

"You want to take Buddy home with you."

"Only for a little visit—only until you are up and around again, if it wouldn't distress you too much—"

"I have no right to try to keep him, Mrs. Farmer."

"You have every right, my dear — and please don't think Blaine or his father or I would ever attempt to deny that right," said Mrs. Farmer. "We feel that he is far more your child than he was your sister's, and we shall never attempt to deprive you of him. But we thought—just while you were ill—if you could spare him to us for a little while, we'd be so grateful."

Norma said instantly, "Mrs. Farmer, you mustn't plead for him. He's your son's baby. You can do so much for him. Father and I can do nothing. And a baby belongs with his dad—especially a boy. Please take him. Just let me come and see him now and then—or bring him to see me—"

She was startled to discover that in her secret heart she was perfectly willing to surrender the baby. Once the very thought of such a thing would have broken her heart.

MRS. FARMER said anxiously, "My dear—is—do you feel ill? Shall I get the doctor?—You look so odd."

"I guess it was discovering, Mrs. Farmer, that I can let you take Buddy home with you where he belongs—and not break my heart about it!" admitted Norma. "It isn't that I don't adore him—or that I won't miss him—or worry about not having him to take care of. Because of course I will. But somehow it seems—well, so right for you to take him, and to keep him—"

Mrs. Farmer bent and kissed her. "How I wish Blaine had given me 'you for a daughter!"

And, queerly enough, Norma could smile at that and say frankly, "Well, he very nearly did, Mrs. Farmer—only Carol has always been the beauty in this family."

"That I cannot admit. I do not agree with you at all. You're—why, Norma, you're lovely!" said Mrs. Farmer almost impatiently, as though bitterly resenting Norma's disparagement of her looks.

Norma laughed a little. "Maybe that's because I'm not making any fuss over surrendering your baby to you!"

"You and I can be friends, my dear," said Mrs. Farmer. "I hope some day we shall be."

"Thank you—I hope so, too!"

After Mrs. Farmer had gone, Blaine came in and stood beside the bed, looking down at Norma where she lay against her pillows. She looked very young with the silver ribbon threaded through her hair, the intriguing web of maize-yellow satin and frost-fine lace about her shoulders. He was silent for so long that she became a little restive and said, striving for a gay note, "What's the matter? Have I a smudge on my nose? Emma washed my face very carefully, I assure you."

"I'm just filling my mind and my heart with the way you look," said Blaine quietly. "I'm going back into active service before long. War's a business lacking in lovely sights. So a man who knows what he is about fills his mind with the memory of lovely things—so that he can think of them when the going gets tough!"

"That's a very pretty speech, Blaine—thank you!"

"You're a soldier, Norma—a general in any army! They don't make 'em any finer or straighter or more splendid! I think I admire you more than anyone I've ever known. Some day, when I come back, I hope you'll let me say things that you are not ready to hear now!"

The color burned hot beneath her clear skin and she said after a moment, "Thank you for knowing I'm not ready—yet."

"May I come back, Norma — some day?"

"Please do," said Norma.

Their eyes met and clung and their hearts seemed to beat in a rhythm she had never known before. Blaine lifted her hand, kissed it, and went out of the room.

Norma lay very still, a little breathless, her eyes wide. She had seen in Blaine's eyes the message that once she would have given the very heart out of her body to see. She had caught a tone in his voice that her ears had once ached to hear. She had felt the touch of his mouth on her hand. He had looked at her as a man looks at a woman he is going to love. And somehow she had not reacted. There had been no wild, exultant pounding of her heart. There had been none of that breathless excitement that once had whipped through her veins at the sight of him.

She was frightened because it meant so little to her. Then she drew a long breath and put her shaking hands to her forehead and pushed the bright hair back, as though to clear her mind. She had not reacted to Blaine's emotion because she was still weak and tired from her illness. Later on, when she was well and strong again, the fact that Blaine might some day learn to care for her as she had cared so long for him would send her into a seventh heaven of delight. But at the moment she was too tired and too sleepy to think very much about it. And, with her cheek on her hand, she slipped off into slumber. Later on would be time enough to think of Blaine. Right now she must rest and sleep and get strong again.

CHAPTER XX

—TIM MORGAN'S FLOWERS—

THE house seemed terribly quiet and empty after the Farmers had gone, taking the baby with them. Blaine had been ordered to Washington until he was in physical condition to go back into active service.

Mrs. Farmer, dreading the wrench of separating Emma from the baby, had suggested tentatively that Emma go with them and continue as the baby's nurse. Emma was so indignant at the bare idea that she might leave her beloved Miss Norma and the judge, that she was all but insulting. For which Norma chided her after the Farmers had gone.

"Mrs. Farmer meant well, Emma. She would have given you a large salary and you'd have had the baby—" Norma began.

"What I want with a big salary? How's I gonna spen' it up there wid dem Yankees?" demanded Emma belligerently, arms akimbo, her eyes flashing. "What I want to go off wid strangers, leavin' my home here where I be'n livin' since I was born? Miss Norma, you ain't tryin' to git rid o' me, is yo'?"

"Nonsense, Emma—of course not!"

"Well, it's a good thing yo ain got no mo' chance o' firin' me than them Japs has o' ketchin that fine-lookin' Marse General MacArthur asleep! An' yo' knows how much chance they is o' that!" said Emma firmly.

"Of course, Emma. Father and I would be lost without you—"

"Well, o course yo' would. Ain' I been knowin' that?"

"Emma, will you climb down off that high horse and behave yourself?" said Norma halfway between exasperation and laughter. "You'd think I'd been trying to sell you into slavery!"

"Well, ain' nobody gwine th'ow me out o' my home, lessen I wants to go," Emma assured her.

"Nobody's trying to, you idiot! We only thought you were so crazy about the baby that you'd miss him terribly—"

"I misses Little Scrapper—like his pappy call him!" admitted Emma. "But I ain' never miss anybody like I'd miss yo' and de judge, honey."

She looked straight at Norma and the belligerence went out of her manner as she said huskily, "Us needs each other. Miss Norma—me an' you and de judge. Us is 'a fambly—an' you can't break up famblies 'thout somebody get's powerful hurt!"

"Well, nobody's going to be hurt like that in this family, then," said Norma, patting the ample shoulder on which she had wept out her griefs since childhood. "And now—let's forget about it, shall we?"

"Yessum—le's us do dat!" beamed Emma. She started out of the room, pausing at the door to say, "I most fo'got—dey's a heap o' fancy flowers done come fo' yo'—like dey's been doin' every week since yo' been sick. Yo' reckon yo's strong enough to have 'em here in de room?"

Norma blinked. "Fancy flowers? Who's been sending them?"

Emma met her eyes straightly. "Dat nice gen'leman. Marse Morgan," she answered.

Norma stared at her, wide-eyed, while a wave of color swept over her face.

"Tim Morgan has been sending me 'fancy flowers' every week since I've been ill? And nobody told me anything about it?" she demanded.

Emma's eyes twinkled a little, but she was quite grave as she folded her arms across her generous stomach where a spotless white apron was tied neatly, and said reasonably, "Well, de doctorman said y'all mustn't have too many flowers in yo' room—and Marse Morgan he be'n jus' about buyin' out all dem fancy florists in Jacksonville an' Atlanta. So I jus' be'n puttin' de flowers round de house. Dey sho was pretty, too!"

Norma was sitting erect now, her cheeks pink.

"Well, of all the nerve!" she exploded. "Cheating me out of my flowers—putting them around the house, indeed! I'd like to know who was sick, anyway—if I didn't get my own flowers? Who had a better right to them?"

EMMA chuckled.

"Well, yo' better say somethin' to dat doctorman."

"I'll say plenty to him—and to you, too, if you don't bring my flowers right up. And, by the way, how did he know I was ill?" Norma demanded, curiously.

Emma's face was bland.

"Wellum," she began briskly, "he telefoam—over long distance from Washington, D.C., one night an' wanna chat wid yo'. When I tell him yo' is bad-off sick, he swear like he was worried, and den he say he call me ever' night. He did, too—till I tell him yo' was out of danger. An' de flowers come twice a week."

"And this is the first you've told me about them?" exclaimed Norma. "Well, you hustle yourself right downstairs and bring them up—every single one of them. I've always wondered what it would be like to have my room banked with flowers, the way it happens in story books!"

SHABBY GLORY — By Peggy Gaddis

"Well, honey, yo' jus' befo' findin' out," said Emma, and departed.

Norma lay feeling a warm little glow of excitement, remembering Tim; the morning in the garden when he had offered her the most unexpected and unusual proposal any girl could ever have. Pointing out with brutal frankness her lack of beauty, her lack of outstanding brilliance of mind, all of which she had agreed was quite true. He had been almost violent in his objection to loving her and his inability to keep from it.

And then, as though a chill wind had blown suddenly across her, as though a dark cloud had blotted the sun, she remembered something that had followed immediately that scene in the garden with Tim—Carol's tempestuous arrival, and all that had followed.

The color faded from her cheeks, leaving her face pinched and wan, and there was a heaviness in her heart that made her feel the burden of it was too much to bear.

Emma came up the stairs and opened the door, half hidden behind a great mass of flowers.

"I gits some vases and bowls—" began Emma, her black face wreathed with smiles as she peered between the great sheaf of blossoms at her mistress.

"Take them away, Emma," said Norma sternly.

Emma paused, bewildered.

"What yo' say, honey?"

"I said take them away—get them out of here! I don't ever want to see them—or hear Tim Morgan's name mentioned again! Do you hear? Take them out. Throw them in the fire. No—send them to the hospital. Do whatever you like with them—only get them out of my sight!" said Norma, and hated herself because her voice shook and there were tears of weakness in her eyes.

"Miss Norma, honey—"

"Get out!" ordered Norma, her tone one that Emma had seldom heard from her in all the years of their lives together. "And don't ever let me hear you mention Tim Morgan again. Do you understand?"

Emma stood very still for a moment, her arms gone lax about the great mass of flowers, so that above them now her dark face was clearly visible. Her eyes tragic, her face mutinous.

"Miss Norma, honey—honey-lamb—yo' gwine make yo'self sick again," she pleaded.

But Norma had buried her face in her pillow and would say no more. She heard the door close at last behind Emma, and the heady fragrance of the flowers followed her like a ghost.

How could she have so nearly forgotten, Norma wondered drearily, the part Tim Morgan had played in the havoc of their lives? If it hadn't been for Tim Morgan, Carol would never have had that taste of the limelight; that brief taste that had made her restless and discontented with her husband and child. If Tim hadn't come into their lives, Carol would be alive today. She and Blaine would have adjusted their lives. Norma tried desperately to make herself believe this, even while common sense told her that Carol was too self-willed, too arrogant to adjust herself to anybody. But if Tim had not come along with his newspaper stories, his radio and newsreels and public appearances, helping Carol to tear to pieces the glory for which at that time they thought Blaine had given his life— She made herself stop crying and pulled herself erect in bed.

All that was done with. Carol was gone. Tim Morgan must never be allowed to thrust the thin edge of even his name into her life any more. Emma must be made to tell him that his telephone calls and his flowers were unwelcome and must cease. And she, Norma, must never permit herself to think of him again . . .

CHAPTER XXI

—THE JUDGE PROBES—

She set herself with her usual determination and forthrightness to the business of getting well. She stood over Emma at the telephone a week later, and made Emma repeat the words that she had given her.

"Nawsuh, Marse Morgan, y'all can't talk to Miss Norma," Emma said doggedly and sullenly. "'Cause why? 'Cause she don't wanna talk to yo'. Nawsuh, she ain't sick no mo'. She's up and aroun'—but she say she don't wanna talk to yo'. She don't wanna git no mo' flowers from you'; an' she don't wanna see yo'—not never no mo'! Dat's jus' what she say, Marse Morgan."

She listened a minute and the heavy sullenness of her dark face lighted a little. There was a wicked gleam in her eyes as she said, "Yassuh. Marse Morgan, she sho' is! An' dat's a fact! She as stubbo'n as a blue-nose mule—and dey ain' nothin' mo' stubbo'n dan dat!"

She listened again and suddenly she guffawed. Norma snatched the telephone from her and dropped the receiver into its cradle, ending the conversation without ceremony.

"I think you forget yourself, Emma," she told her sternly. "The idea of comparing me to a mule!"

Emma was still chuckling.

"Marse Morgan, he say tell yo' he kind o' stubbo'n too. He say he think mebbe he got blue-nose mule blood, too!" she reported.

"That will do, Emma!"

Emma flounced towards the kitchen. At the door that opened from the end of the hall into the service quarters, she paused to say darkly, "Dey ain't nothin' I 'spises mo' dan a cross-patch old maid—an' if y'all don't mend yo' ways with the gen'lemen, Miss Norma, yo' is certain-sho' to wind up bein' one o' dem old maids—de meanes' kind!"

Before Norma could find an answer to that, she had flounced out and the door swung shut behind her.

Norma drew a long breath and made herself relax a little. She was through with Tim Morgan. She'd never see him again—and that was just dandy, she assured herself grimly. She had had about all of Tim Morgan she could take in one lifetime.

As her strength returned, she took up her old duties. The garden had rioted during her illness. Emma's nephew, Hosea, came to help her restore it to its former beautiful order. Norma worked an hour or so each day in the garden; she took up again her Red Cross work, in the surgical dressings department; she and her father were air raid wardens and took their training for the post side by side.

Her life was filled; she was busy; she could honestly feel that what she was doing was worthwhile and that she was needed; but in spite of all that, there was a strange emptiness in her heart and a meaningless to her life, no matter how hard she worked. She tried to tell herself that she missed the baby, and Blaine. Of course that was it. A convalescent and a brand new baby can keep a house so busy and one's hands so full that when they have gone they leave behind them a space that is difficult to fill.

The judge had aged appreciably in these last months, and Norma's heart yearned over him, though she knew him far too well to put her anxiety into words. Instead, she tried to see that he had his rest undisturbed; that he had the food he liked best. On their occasional free evenings she saw to it that the people he liked best were invited in; more than one pleasant evening of pinochle with Dr. Andrews, and a rousing poker game now and then with half a dozen of his old friends, with sandwiches — man-sized — and cold beer served at 10. This, Norma knew, helped him to feel young and important again, and was the best medicine she could give him.

One evening when they had had an especially appetizing dinner, part of which Norma had cooked for him herself, in spite of Emma's disapproving sniffs and injured dignity, Judge Stewart settled himself in his shabby old chair in the living-room, and as he filled his pipe, he studied Norma quietly.

"There are women born with the gift of beauty so great that it all but stops the admiring heart," he said unexpectedly. "And there are women born to make a home out of four bare walls and a man's heart. Any man lucky enough to find the second kind is a fool to settle for the other!"

Norma, settling herself beneath the lamp in a corner, with some Red Cross sewing in her lap, smiled at her father and raised her eyebrows lightly.

"I wouldn't know what called it forth—but that was a very nice speech," she told him. "Of course, I'm taking it for granted that I'm the second type of woman, since I couldn't possibly be accused of being the first."

"You have a quality of beauty that is far more heart-stopping than that of peach-blossom skin, eyes like wet purple pansies and a heart-shaped face," said the judge, wrinkling his nose a little at the sentimental, hackneyed phrases. "You have a beauty that comes from the heart and the soul—a warm, quick, generous heart and a soul that is very real and honest."

Norma looked at him, puzzled.

"Just what are you leading up to, father?" she asked after a moment.

"Does a man have to be leading up to something in order to offer his devoted daughter a word of honest appreciation for her efforts to make him comfortable in his old age?" he demanded.

"I'm afraid you do, father. Something brought all this up. You can't hide it from me, darling—so give out!" said Norma firmly.

The judge was having some slight difficulty in getting his pipe lighted and drawing to his satisfaction.

"I guess maybe I'm sentimental—thinking of how lonely I'll be when you make some young fellow happier than he deserves by marrying him," he admitted.

Norma's hand clenched and the needle thrust painfully into her thumb. She looked straight at her father and said, "I have an idea that's something you won't have to worry about, father, for a long time. Most any man a girl would want nowadays, Uncle Sam wants him, too—and he's got the prior claim."

The judge tamped his tobacco down with an expert thumb and, as though treading on ground so uncertain that at any moment he might break through, he said awkwardly, "I—ah—thought maybe that—well, you were very fond of Blaine once—"

"Yes, I was very fond of Blaine—once. I still am, of course."

"But not in the same way?"

"I'm not in love with him any longer, father, if that's what you mean."

Her father looked swiftly at her. "You're sure about that?"

"Quite sure," she answered with an instant conviction that her father could safely accept as definite. "It's queer, I know. I was so mad about him that just the sound of his voice made my heart climb up in my throat and do nip-ups. I avoided his touch for fear I would break down and betray myself. I was so in love with him that I almost lost my head. Up until the night when the baby passed his crisis—and I passed out! You remember?"

"I remember," said her father wryly, his hand clenching a little on the bowl of his pipe.

"After I began to come back to consciousness—after the first few days, I realized that Blaine was just one of the family." Norma was trying to put into words the chaos of her thoughts, as though to clarify the situation for herself quite as much as for her father. "I realized one day that when he touched me, it didn't mean anything. That when he kissed my hand, there was no reaction whatever. I didn't want him to kiss me. I liked him! I found him companionable and all that, but there was no—no—spark. I don't know where I lost it, father. Do you suppose it was that blow on the head?"

She smiled slightly and her father looked relieved.

"It could have been," he agreed, anxious to rally to her mood. "So Blaine's chances are nil?"

"I'm afraid quite as nil as Blaine would like them to be," answered Norma. "I don't honestly believe he and I could find happiness together now, not even if we were madly in love with each other. There'd always be—well, a ghost between us; a ghost that would grow stronger and more real as the baby grew up—"

"Aren't you being just a little morbid, my dear?"

Norma flushed and met his eyes straightly.

"Maybe I am, father. It's just that I know it wouldn't have worked out for Blaine and me—after all that has happened—and I'm terribly glad that it doesn't matter any more! Maybe Dr. Andrews gave me something that eliminated that very painful emotion I used to feel for Blaine—and if he did, I'm grateful."

"Don't tell him—or he'll put it in his bill!" warned the judge.

Norma picked up her sewing again and said tranquilly, "So I'm afraid, father, you're stuck with an old-maid daughter. I'm on your hands for life. I hope the prospect doesn't alarm you too much?"

"Not for myself!" the judge assured her firmly. "The prospect enchants me! Only I'd like to see you happily settled down, my dear—with a baby of your own to fuss over."

"Babies are sweet!" Norma admitted wistfully. And then added, "But if I'm not to have one of my own, maybe there will be other people who'll let me help them raise theirs!"

"Without a doubt."

There was a little companionable silence while she sewed and he worried his faithful old pipe. At last he cleared his throat and looked anxiously at her, and Norma knew he had not finished. There was something else on his mind.

"Er—have you heard from that young fellow, Morgan, any more lately?" he hazarded at last.

CHAPTER XXII

—A CHANGE IN NORMA—

Once more Norma's needle slipped and pricked her finger. Her face grew warm and she knew her father was completely aware of the fact. She flung up her head and faced him.

"I haven't heard from him, nor do I expect to," she said clearly. "The last time he called, I had Emma tell him that I wanted never to see him or hear from him again."

"That was being pretty drastic, don't you think?"

"Not too drastic, since it was the truth. Father, you can't possibly want me to go on seeing a man who has caused all the misery and heartache in our family that Tim Morgan has caused, do you?"

"Oh, come now," protested the judge, "You are being both drastic and morbid! You have no right, surely, to accuse Morgan of such a thing."

"If he hadn't come to the hospital that day to interview Carol—to offer her those contracts—" began Norma hotly.

"Wait a minute—wait a minute! Let's be fair about it, my dear. After all, there were other wives of men who were heroes—any number of them, who have been faced, I am sure, with the same sort of proposition that faced Carol. But not one of them lost her head. They have been as magnificent, as fine in their own way as their young husbands were! No, Norma, you can't blame Tim Morgan for what happened to Carol. You can't blame anybody, painful as it is to admit it, except Carol herself."

Norma sat very still for a moment, and then she asked levelly, "Did you see the letter Carol left? The one I tried to keep Blaine from seeing?"

The judge's face darkened a little and he nodded.

"Yes, my dear, I read it. Blaine wanted me to."

"And in the face of that, you can still have a good word for Tim Morgan?"

Her father studied her curiously. "Are you so sure she went away with Tim?" he asked at last. "She was alone in the car, remember."

"But she was going to join him—"

"With, or without his consent?"

"With it, of course. Carol was so lovely. She could have had any man she wanted. She happened to want Tim."

"She wanted Blaine first, and took him, knowing you loved him and that he was more than half in love with you," her father reminded her. "It was always Carol's way to want something that belonged to someone else. I think she began to suspect Tim's interest in you—and that sharpened her own plans to take him. But if Tim had wanted to take her with him, I feel sure they would have gone together. Tim is not the man to sneak. I believe if he had wanted Carol, he would have been man enough to come to Blaine and have it out with him, man to man. He would not have sneaked away on the train, leaving Carol to join him along the road somewhere."

"But her letter, father—she left one for me, too—a letter that was even more cruel, if possible, than the one to Blaine. If she wasn't going to meet Tim somewhere—"

"Norma, listen to me a moment," said her father. The very quiet of his tone told her that he was in deadly earnest.

"I happen to know that Carol went to the hotel that morning to see Tim. She told him she was fed up with life here. She begged him to take her away with him. He refused—but he admits that for a moment he was tempted. He loved you. You had convinced him of the hopelessness of that love, and he had a momentary impulse to take Carol away, leaving Blaine free to marry you, when he had come to his senses. But he turned Carol down. She was furious, of course. She went with him to the train and threatened to stage a scene, but there was a crowd there and she didn't. Then she came home, wrote those letters, and decided to follow Tim. She must have gone for a ride to think things out. I am sure that she was not on her way to follow Tim when she crashed. Otherwise, there would have been bags in the car. She had almost no money with her. She couldn't have meant to do more than go for a ride. She was driving recklessly, as always, and the car crashed. But I do not see how you can hold Tim Morgan to blame for what happened."

Norma, watching him closely, demanded suddenly, "How do you know all this, father?"

Her father hesitated, and then he looked straight at her, saying quietly, "Morgan himself told me—while you were so ill."

"You—you mean he was here? Emma didn't tell me!"

"Emma didn't know it. He was passing through town, with half an hour to kill—at least he said he was. Anyway, he came to my office and—well, we talked it all out, man to man. He feels badly about all that has happened, but I think when I told him I did not feel he was to blame, it made him feel a bit better."

THE judge was still worrying his pipe and Norma said shakily "For—for heaven's sake, father, stop fiddling with that poor pipe. You'll—you'll ruin it."

The judge peered at her over his spectacles, scarcely daring to hope that her tone had really sounded almost light; almost hysterical, too, he reminded himself uneasily.

"Well—anyway, that's the situation as it now stands," he told her, relieved at her seeming composure. "Tim Morgan seems a nice enough fellow—and he thinks a lot of you, Norma. I think you owe it to him to at least see him and talk to him—"

"I—can't, father."

"Why, Norma?"

She got swiftly to her feet and flung the neglected sewing aside.

"I just can't, father—not right away," she stammered. "Maybe some day, when all this horror is over—but not now. Don't—don't ask me to."

"I'm asking you nothing, Norma," said her father soothingly. "After all, it's your own life and you have a right to live it as you like—but I want you to be happy, my dear. I can't think of anyone who deserves happiness more than you do—maybe because you've had so little of it and have worked so hard to give it to others."

Norma bent swiftly and kissed him.

"You're a darling, father. Thank you for everything. I'll work it out some way."

"Sure you will, my dear—sure you will," answered her father.

The doorbell rang sharply. Norma caught her breath and straightened, to look sharply, accusingly, at her father.

"No, no—it's not Tim—that is, if it is, I know nothing about it," her father disclaimed the unspoken accusation.

But Norma went to the door, her heart in her throat, her hands shaking. As she swung the door open and Dr. Andrews stepped across the threshold, she tried to deny the sharp surge of disappointment that shook her. Crazy—absurd—utterly fantastic to be disappointed because Dr. Andrews was unexpectedly free for a cribbage game with her father!

She saw them settled comfortably to their game before she went out into the garden where the white moonlight lent a strange, unreal enchantment to even the tiniest and most insignificant weeds, and spread with magic the flowers that dreamed fragrantly beneath the dewy night. Beneath the giant live-oaks the moonlight and shadow made a white and black mosaic. The Spanish moss stirred ever so gently, like ladies in hoopskirts advancing and retreating in the dainty steps of the minuet.

Here she had last seen Tim Morgan. Here, where she had knelt, gathering vegetables for dinner; here, with her hands grubby, a floppy, unbecoming garden hat shielding her face, her pink linen morning frock stained a little with earth where she had knelt. Here Tim had told her, violently and almost unwillingly, of his love; here she had denied him and flung into his face the love she felt for her sister's husband!

She shivered a little before the parade of memories that trooped past her there in the moonlit garden. That day when Tim had told her of his love seemed years away, instead of weeks. So much had happened. Poor Carol's death; the baby's illness; that ugly scene when Blaine had demanded the letter Carol had left him; Norma's own illness; and now—Tim had come back.

The human heart, Norma told herself dimly, was a queer thing. When she had not a chance at Blaine's love, when he had been married to her sister, she had all but broken her heart over him. She had felt that she would give everything she had, everything she might hope to have, for the freedom to love Blaine and to have his love.

Now when Blaine was free, when he was more than half in love with her and only the smallest push on her part would tumble him fully into love with her—she didn't want him. The thought of him—of his love—of his arms about her, his kisses warm on her lips, did not stir her in the least. He was a pleasant, attractive young man of whom she was fond, as she would always be fond of a brother.

She adored the baby as a loving aunt. She no longer yearned for Blaine's love, nor felt that consuming maternal obsession for the baby. A great deal of that sharp, burning tension had seemed to drain from her during her illness. It was as though that illness had been some sort of operation that had gone straight into her heart and painlessly removed the love she had felt for Blaine.

And in place of her love for Blaine that had once filled her heart so full—what was left? Nothing, she told herself hastily and firmly. Absolutely nothing but an emptiness that, after the stress and turmoil of these last crowded months, was downright pleasant.

She lifted her arms in a little gesture of freedom, as though she would embrace the whole of the sleeping garden, and raised her face gratefully to the soft night wind. She was free at last of the turmoil and unhappiness and emotional upheaval; she could just live and—and—vegetate! And it would be pretty pleasant for a while, too, she told herself almost grimly. A badly needed rest!

CHAPTER XXIII

—MORGAN AGAIN—

ABOUT a week later, Norma was busily housecleaning. During the spring so much had happened that Emma had been unable to do anything more than what she called a "lick an' a promise" toward keeping the house clean. It was such a big old house with enormous rooms and many closets and corners where useless things had a way of accumulating. So she and Emma had laid their plans, and on a bright, warm morning they had set to work.

Norma, in a pair of faded blue slacks and a cotton shirt equally as faded, was high on a stepladder, sweeping down the walls of the living-room. Emma, on her hands and knees, with an enormous scrub-bucket, a brush and a cake of yellow laundry soap, was busily preparing the reception hall for its waxing.

Emma was singing one of her beloved spirituals, a long, drawn-out, doleful sound, which she vastly enjoyed.

"Go down, Moses, down into Egypt land," she sang mournfully and with gusto. Then she added in a stern tone, "Tell old Pharaoh, let my people go-o-o!"

Norma, on the stepladder, grinned a little.

How many years, she wondered idly, had she and Emma cleaned the house to the sound of "Go Down, Moses"? The waxing of the floors was always done to the sound of "Mary, Don't You Weep"—a gay, merry little tune as Emma sang it. The dishes were washed in the morning to the tune of "Little David, Play on Your Harp." Emma loved spirituals. She was innocently aware of and very proud of the warm, mellow voice that played an exalted part in the choir of Little Bethel, the church to which she was devoted.

Norma could tell by the vigor of her singing just how well Emma was getting along with her work, and smiled as the vigor of the tone increased a little.

There was a tiny hesitation, a brief silence, and then Emma began again, more strongly than ever, her voice more peremptory:

"Tell old Pharaoh, Let my people go-o-o-o!"

Norma stepped backward down the ladder—and into arms that held her firmly. Her pulses leaped and the breath caught in her throat as Tim Morgan's voice said in her ear:

"I take it all back. I thought slacks were unfeminine and ugly. I see I've been watching the wrong women wear them. On you, my treasure, they look good!"

It was a full moment before Norma could pull herself together, and out of his arms. When she could face him at last, her face burned and her eyes could not quite meet his. "You—you would come calling when I'm doing my housecleaning!" she said shakily.

"I thought maybe you and I could do a bit of housecleaning together," said Tim, his eyes warm and eager.

She put shaking hands to her head, pulled the scarf loose and shook out her hair.

"I must look a perfect—horror!" she said, like an abashed schoolgirl.

"You look perfect," said Tim gravely. "To me, you always will—even when you're in a temper and trying to drive me away from you—which you aren't going to be able to do easily, you know. I'm determined—and, I guess, a little bit nuts. But that's the kind of a guy I am! Or—are you interested?"

Still she could not quite meet his eyes, and she said hurriedly, "If—if only you'll sit down somewhere and wait until I can change—"

"I don't want you to change, Norma—your clothes or yourself or anything about you!" said Tim earnestly. "All I want you to do is listen to me and put me out of my misery once and for all. Norma—there are things between us that must be said. I'm shoving off in a couple of days. I've got to know where I stand with you before I go."

All the color left Norma's face. Her eyes widened and met his with a little shock.

"You are going—to war?" she stammered.

He nodded. "I've got all the necessary papers—passports and such-like. My paper is sending me into the Pacific theatre. One of our fellows out there failed to get out of Corregidor in time. I'm to take his place—or make one for myself. Will you come somewhere and talk to me? We'll tell Emma about it later—"

From the hall, beyond the partly open door, Norma heard Emma's indignant sniff, followed by a little chuckle, and Emma's voice launched gaily into "Mary, Don't You Weep," sung at a pace Little Bethel would have frowned upon.

"The garden, maybe?" suggested Tim hopefully. "I have some memories of that garden—one I'd like to remove, if possible. The one about you telling me you loved Blaine Farmer and there wasn't any hope for me."

Norma laughed shakily. "You're the darnedest man!" she stammered, avoiding his eyes, leading the way through one of the long French windows, open on the side terrace. "You couldn't possibly have arrived a few nights ago, when I was all dressed up, and the moon was full and the garden was so lovely it made your heart ache."

"Being with you—even in disgraceful slacks and with a smudge on your nose—would make any place beautiful to me," said Tim as he followed her down the path to the old bench shaded by the giant rosevine.

THERE, as she turned to face him, he said quietly: "May I speak for a moment about Carol?"

Norma caught her breath and set her teeth hard in her lower lip before she answered faintly, "Yes—of course."

"She wasn't in love with me, darling," said Tim, complete conviction in the very simplicity of his words. "And she never thought for one moment that I was with her. We got to understand each other pretty well during that publicity period of hers. And there was no question of love. We didn't even like each other very well."

"When she found you'd been here that morning, she was quite sure you had come to see her. When I tried to tell her you had come to see me, and that you'd said you loved me, she would not believe me." Norma pointed out remorselessly.

Tim nodded. "Carol didn't like to think men could have eyes for anyone else, or that they could want to marry anyone else," he said quietly, and Norma, wincing a little, knew that was true. "She came to me at the hotel that day and begged me to take her with me—not as my mistress, nor even as a fiancee whom I would marry, once Blaine had divorced her—but just as a sort of travelling companion, so Blaine would have to divorce her. She felt she had a future, away from this little town. She hated being tied down with a husband and a baby. She wanted to be free to try for the movies—maybe the stage. She was quite sure she could get work as a model—anything that seemed 'glamorous,' poor kid. She felt that if she just went away by herself and without a scandal, Blaine would follow her and try to get her to come back. She wanted a clean, sharp break with him, and she knew that the quickest way would be for him to think she'd gone with me."

He looked down at Norma's white face and after a moment he said huskily, "Sweet—it breaks my heart to hurt you like this—"

"Go on," said Norma evenly.

He studied her for a moment uneasily, and then he said, "Well, for a little while I admit I was tempted to do as she asked. It would set Blaine Farmer free and you might easily marry him—if he had sense enough to realize his luck. But then—well, at the last, I couldn't go through with it. It seemed to me a pretty dirty trick to play on a man like Blaine Farmer—after all he had gone through. I knew he was mad about her. I tried to talk some sense into her, and I thought at last I'd succeeded. She left the hotel, and I went to the train. But she was there on the station platform. She had threatened to make a scene so I'd have to take her. For a moment, when I saw her there, I admit I shivered a little. But there was a crowd of people there. Half a dozen young draftees were being 'seen off' to the army. Quite a number of prominent people in the town were there, and of course Carol was recognized.

"The mayor asked her if she would make a little speech to the young men, because, as the wife of one of America's first heroes, whatever she had to say would mean a lot to them. She looked at me and then at the waiting crowd. I think for the first moment she realized what it would mean if she stirred up a scandal by running away with another man. Then she made a speech—as graceful a little speech as she ever made in her life. It was quite a scene. There was a local newsreel man on hand to get shots of the going-away. He photographed Carol during the speech, and I saw her sort of—well, bloom. The limelight was something she loved and she was getting another taste of it. Well, that's about all. The train came; the draftees got aboard, after giving a cheer for Mrs. Blaine Farmer. I waited for her to say good-by to me, but all she said was, 'Okay, mister—you win. I'll stick it out if I can.' Then she walked away. That was the last I ever saw of her."

Long before he had finished the tears were pouring down Norma's face and she was in his arms, held close and hard against him. She could feel the eager pounding of his heart beneath her cheek. When he offered her his handkerchief to mop the tears, she managed a faint smile at him, and Tim said unsteadily, taking the handkerchief from her, "Here, let me. There really is a smudge on your nose, you know."

She became conscious of his arms about her and drew away from him, turning her back, standing against the trellis that supported the rosevine. She was silent so long that Tim said at last, anxiously:

"That's the whole story, so help me! Maybe I am to blame for having given Carol her taste for the limelight—"

"No—I don't feel that any more. Father and I talked it all out. I guess we are chiefly to blame. She—she was such a pretty baby—such an exquisite child. People always raved about her. I guess she sort of got exaggerated ideas of her own importance. And father and I loved her so dearly we couldn't bear to—to discipline her. We always saw to it that she got whatever she wanted—poor, poor Carol!"

"Darling—please don't cry! Unless you want me to cry, too!" said Tim. "It wouldn't be a bit of trouble, the way I feel right this minute, to burst into tears and howl like a hound dog under a full moon."

That made Norma laugh shakily, and after a moment he said, "And so then Blaine Farmer and you—"

"I'm not in love with Blaine any more. Isn't that silly?"

Tim was very still. A muscle twitched in his jaw and then his face was expressionless, only the little flame leaping in his eyes to betray his inner emotion.

"Very silly. Very silly, indeed—considering that when you couldn't have him, you wanted no one else," said Tim at last, his tone as carefully controlled as his face.

"I know," admitted Norma. "I—I guess I'm just a foolish woman who doesn't know her own mind."

CHAPTER XXIV

—ACCEPTANCE—

TIM said carefully: "There—I guess there wouldn't be a chance that maybe you would sort of get used to having me around? You'd have quite a while to get used to the idea. I'll be gone for the well known duration—which may be anything from a year, as the wide-eyed optimists feel, to a five or even ten-year stretch, as the so-called experts feel. Would that be long enough? I could sort of wait around—"

"How—how soon must you go?"

"Tomorrow," answered Tim. "The midnight plane west."

"Then—why are we wasting so much time?" demanded Norma unsteadily.

Tim's body jerked as he started to take a step toward her, and pulled up abruptly. His hands were clenched into tight fists and his face was white and set, his eyes blazing.

"Don't kid me, angel," he said at last. "I can't quite take it! Not from you. If you love me—say so, sweet. But if you don't—don't kid me!"

"I'm an awful fool, Tim. I've made us waste such a lot of time," said Norma, as she came to him. "I do love you—with all my heart. I must have loved you for a long time, though I've been fighting not to—"

"Darling!" said Tim huskily. "Darling—why fight? What's there to be afraid of? Oh, Norma, we've lost so much time—and we've got so little left!"

She was in his arms now. Held close and hard against him as though he would never let her go again. And she was lifting her face for his kiss. It was a moment so perfect that it wiped out of their minds the pain of the last few months. So perfect that he could scarcely believe it was true.

Presently he held her a little away from him so he could see her lovely flushed face beneath the tumbled sunshiny curls, his eyes looking deep into hers, filling his mind with their sweet surrender.

"What a battle you gave me, sweet!" he said at last. "I've known, almost from the moment I walked down the hospital steps and came face to face with a tall regal looking girl—"

"Regal looking? Oh, Tim, you're laughing at me!" she gasped, halfway between tears and laughter, her hand touching his face in a fleeting caress. "Nobody ever called me regal!"

"That's because nobody ever saw you the way I do," said Tim. "I thought then that you were a treasure any man would willingly break his heart to capture—and you are, my sweet—you are."

Norma kissed him for that. And then, because moments of such poignant delight are so sharp as to be almost pain, and because the heart can not endure them for long, she tried to be light and teasing.

"I'm still not beautiful," she reminded him.

"Thank heaven! I can't imagine anything more boring than a beautiful wife!"

"Nor outstandingly brilliant."

"Thank heaven again. Brilliant women make very poor wives for men who are not outstandingly brilliant themselves!"

"Nor sophisticated or suave. I'm not a woman of the world," she remembered, her eyes dancing a little.

"If you had been, I should have run from you like a frightened hare!" said Tim firmly. "I've known sophisticated women. They're hard and callous and brittle. I like my women warm and sweet and mellow—"

Norma stiffened just a little. "Your women?" she repeated. "My good man, I do hope you aren't trifling with the idea that you're going to be allowed to go about knowing scads of sophisticated women—or the other kind, either! From now on, your women will be your woman—and that's me. I hope there won't be any unpleasantness—such as your even admitting that another woman exists! I'll keep an eye—both eyes, in fact!—on you." The raillery in her eyes died beneath the flame that leaped in his. His arms caught her close again and she heard him say, half under his breath:

"Oh, darling—darling!"

WHEN some very small remnant of sanity returned to them, Norma looked up at the sun, and said, "Oh, my goodness, it must be almost noon! Father will be home for lunch—"

"Swell! How is he? He's a great old boy—I love him! And not just because he's your father. I never had a father of my own—not that I knew about, I mean. I grew up in an orphanage until I was old enough to rebel and run away. If I could look the world over and select my own father he'd look a lot like the judge! But he probably wouldn't be a lot like the judge. I've an idea the judge is pretty unique."

"Thank you for realizing that. He likes you, too."

"Swell!" Tim beamed. "We're getting off on the right foot, then. D'you think he'll let me marry you before I go tomorrow?"

"Tomorrow." The word caught sharply at her heart, twisting it cruelly. So little time. A handful of precious hours in which everything she had hoped for and dreamed of must be wrapped. He would come back—oh, of course he would! Only—the man whose place he was going to fill had not come back.

A black cloud blotted out the sun and a cold wind of terror shook her savagely. Then she made herself smile and say in a voice that was incredibly steady, "It might easily be arranged."

Tim looked at her swiftly. Something in his eyes was new; there was a sudden hesitancy in his manner. And after a moment he said, "Norma—there are half a dozen men fighting for the assignment I've got. Shall I let one of them have it—and stay in New York? I can, you know—if I ask it."

Such hope, such joy rushed up in her heart that for a moment she was speechless. It was like having a reprieve in that last long, dreadful mile. New hope, new happiness. Then she looked clearly into his eyes—and her heart slid back to its normal position.

"You want very much to go, don't you, darling?" she asked.

"Yes, sweet—I want very much to go."

She forced herself to smile, though there was a mist of tears in her eyes.

"Then you must go, of course."

Tim looked down at her for a long moment, and suddenly he said tempestuously, "I wonder if you can understand how I feel, sweet? They won't have me in the armed services—not quite the perfect physical specimen Uncle Sam needs to carry a gun, or even load one! But I have a silly sort of notion that maybe I could write something that would make the folks back home here have some realization of what is actually going on out there."

He looked anxiously down at Norma, and she saw that he was desperately in earnest. Norma stood on tiptoe and kissed him.

"Then—I go?" asked Tim quietly.

Norma faced him, her head up, her eyes shining, a smile on her soft mouth—a smile that she had found somewhere in the innermost depths of her heart and hauled up like a flag, to flutter there until she had seen the last of him.

"Go, my dearest? Of course you go—what else?" she answered.

Tim's arms closed about her, holding her so that his cheek was hard against her own, and they were silent for a long, precious moment.

And in that moment, Norma saw all that she was losing by that decision. He would have stayed if she had asked it. Delicately, carefully, she could have undermined his belief in his ability to do the thing he had set his heart on. Just a casual word here and there, and the intrusion of her own need for him—and he would pass the assignment to someone else; he would marry her and they would go to New York to live. It would be so easy! He loved her completely—and men in love are always putty in the hands of a woman they love. Norma knew that she could turn Tim to what she wanted. For a moment she was shaken with a terrible temptation, while his arms held her close and their hearts beat in unison.

She could keep him here; she could make him happy. He might never realize that he had been robbed—because she saw clearly that he would be robbed. Would the happiness she could give him, the well-ordered home—poor darling, he'd never had a home, and she wanted so terribly to make one for him—make up for what he would lose? She could give him children—her heart melted with tenderness at the thought—children to make their home complete.

"Darling, you're trembling!" Tim said contritely.

She lifted her face and tried to smile at him.

"And you're crying!" he said almost sharply. "Oh, sweet, you mustn't—you mustn't cry. I don't ever want you to cry again as long as you live."

She laughed at him unsteadily. "I'm crying because I'm so happy. Don't you know a woman's a queer creature who cries because she's happy, as well as because she's sad?"

"Then how the heck's a guy going to know what's the matter?"

Norma laughed. "He can't. Maybe that's why they say woman is an eternal mystery to man," she teased him. "And now—come on. Emma will think we're lost. And so will father."

CHAPTER XXV

—TWO DAYS HAPPINESS—

BUT when they reached the house the first thing Norma heard was Emma's rich, mellow voice lifted in the most joyous song she ever condescended to sing: "Brighten de corner where yo' is" was Emma's own special version, and she practically shouted it.

Norma left Tim in the library, as yet untouched by the spring cleaning upheaval, and went on to the kitchen. Emma was in the midst of preparations for a luncheon that Norma saw was going to be something pretty special.

"Y'all run on upstairs and git yo'self fixed up, honey," Emma ordered. "I's gwine to have dinner ready soon."

Norma sniffed appreciatively.

"Smells good!" she offered casually.

"Yassum—it's all de things Marse Tim likes best," admitted Emma, unabashed. "Fried chicken an' corn fritters an' hot biscuits—"

"When did you dress a chicken, Emma?" demanded Norma.

"When you an' Marse Tim went out to de garden, I gits busy wid a chicken. I figured he'd be here fo' dinner. Marse Tim likes my cookin'." Emma added modestly.

"And the chocolate cake and the strawberries and cream—all whipped and everything?" demanded Norma. "You didn't get all that together just since he arrived, this morning!"

Emma's face was bland and innocent.

"Well—no'm, I fixed dat cake yestiddy whiles yo' was at the Red Crosses," admitted Emma. "I figured mos' likely de judge might be havin' company tonight."

"Emma, did you know Tim was coming?"

"Yessum," said Emma frankly. "He telefoamed yestiddy whiles yo' was gone."

"And you let me meet him looking like this? You didn't even tip me off, so I could look all pretty and fresh?"

Emma's face crinkled with laughter.

"Law, honey—dat man don't care what yo' wearin'. I don't expect he know what yo' wearin'—he's dat crazy 'bout yo'." She laughed and then added anxiously, "Honey, yo' ain't gwine send him away again, is you? Miss Norma, child—you ain't gwine do dat, is you?"

"No, Emma," said Norma. "I'm not going to send him away. But he's going, anyway."

"To de war?"

Norma nodded.

Emma's face lengthened, and for a moment her hands were still and her eyes were pitying and tender.

"Well, honey, I guess you just got to let him go, then," she said at last. "I reckon men has to fight and women is got to stay home. It ain't right fo' folks to fight and kill each other—but de parson say dey been a-doin it ever since befo' de Li'l Lawd Jesus was born. I reckon dey keeps on a-doin' it just as long as folks is so mean an' cantankerous. But it ain't right, honey, it ain't right."

Norma smiled at her through her tears.

"No, Emma, it isn't right. But as long as there are people envious of us as a nation—people that want to move in on us and take away our liberty—there's nothing for us to do but fight back!"

"An' de quicker dey gitsa bunch of black boys over there with good sharp razors, de quicker de whole mess be cleaned up," said Emma with vigor and conviction.

There was the sound of voices in the library and Norma knew the judge had arrived.

"You run on an' git fixed up, honey," Emma said swiftly, "whiles I dishes up the dinner!"

And Norma laughed and went.

She dressed swiftly, brushing her hair into its usual becoming order. Norma reflected on Emma's words. And had to admit that there was sanity in what Emma said. It wasn't right for people to fight—but there had been wisdom in her own words, too. A man fights to protect his most cherished possessions—and Americans would fight to the last man, to protect their beloved soil that had given birth to their own concept of liberty and freedom for all. And while Tim would not be actually fighting—he would not be a member of the armed forces—still she felt that his skill as a reporter, his ability with words, would be of vital importance in the most gigantic struggle the world had yet known.

When she went back downstairs, she hesitated a moment at the library door before she stepped through it with a little laugh.

"I don't know whether to be coy and linger delicately in the hall while you two settle my destiny," she announced, "or whether I should act my age and come in to demand a share in that decision."

"I hope you want to marry the man, my dear," her father said cheerfully. "He and I have settled it that you shall."

"You're being a little tardy in asking my reaction," suggested Norma.

"You do want to marry me, don't you, sweet?" asked Tim anxiously, as though he still needed reassurance on that point.

"With all my heart," answered Norma instantly, and went into his arms.

The judge polished his glasses briskly and almost forgot to put them back on his nose. Norma saw that his eyes were tired, misty—but that they were happy, too. She turned swiftly to him and kissed him.

"You won't mind, father?" she asked.

"Certainly I'll mind. I'll mind like the very dickens. Of course I knew it had to come some day, but—well, as long as it had to come, I'm glad it's a fellow like Tim who is taking you away from me."

"I'm not, sir," said Tim. "I'm asking you to take me in, too—when all this mess is over. In the good old-fashioned phrase that must be true or it wouldn't be used so much—I'm asking you, sir, not to give me your daughter, but to take me as your son!"

"That eases my mind a lot," said the judge as he shook hands with Tim. "I've always wanted a son."

Tim said huskily, "Thanks, sir—I'll try to deserve that!"

Emma furnished a welcome break in the mounting tension of the scene by saying sociably, "Dinner's ready. Y'all better come on, 'fo' de fritters gits cold."

As they settled themselves about the table, Norma said, "For years I've tried to teach Emma that the mid-day meal is lunch—but to Emma lunch is still a sandwich wrapped in newspaper and eaten on a job somewhere!"

"With the kind of food Emma concocts, I wouldn't quarrel with anything she might choose to call it," answered Tim, and Emma beamed upon him.

AFTER lunch Tim disappeared for an hour on some mysterious business of his own. He returned to swoop Norma up into his arms and say eagerly, "Look, darling—I'll have maybe a couple of days in 'Frisco attending to various little details, mostly waiting for a chance at transportation. So—could you, maybe, marry me right away and go out there with me?"

Norma's heart caught and then began to race very fast. Two precious days. The trip out to San Francisco—it would be a honeymoon of sorts; better than no honeymoon at all. Every minute with him would be precious. Material out of which to build a bridge of memories that would help to cover the gap that would lie between them until he came back. Not even to herself would she say "if." He was a newspaper man, not a soldier. He would have no place in actual battle, even though he would be serving the common cause in his own way. But he would come back. His luck would hold; her prayers, her hopes, her dreams — they would be an amulet against evil—his lucky charm that would bring him back!

"It's polite to speak when you're spoken to," said Tim anxiously, giving her a gentle shake. "I'm asking you to marry me just as soon as it can be arranged—so you can go with me as far as 'Frisco. Aren't you going to answer me?"

"I'm trying," Norma told him unsteadily, "to calm my emotions so I can speak with a certain amount of dignity—not with a tempestuous alacrity that would be very unladylike!"

Tim held her a very little away from him and grinned at her quizzically.

"Such a mouthful of big words!" he exclaimed. "Am I going to have to woo you with a dictionary in my pocket? Or are you, by any chance, saying in your own quaint little way, 'Yes, darling, I'd be delighted to marry you and go with you!'"

"I am trying to say just that—but not by chance," Norma told him, her eyes very warm and tender.

He caught her close again and his mouth claimed hers. And then he said, "Dearest—beloved! I'll try my darnedest not to ever let you be sorry!"

"I won't be," she promised him. "I won't ever be. Only—promise me you'll come back to me."

"Of course, sweet. No power on earth could keep me, knowing you were waiting for me!"

The judge, of course, could accomplish wonders. Not that there was anything especially wonderful about his getting the state's three-day waiting period on licenses waived for the sake of his daughter.

They were to be married in the garden at 5 o'clock, and that, Norma realized, was going to take some stepping on her part to get packed and ready to leave with Tim shortly after the ceremony.

The house was in the throes of spring cleaning, so of course they couldn't be married inside it. There would be no witnesses save the judge and Dr. Andrews. Dr. Parrish, from the church where Norma attended Sunday school as a child and where now she taught a class, would perform the ceremony beneath the shelter of the rose trellis, covered by scarlet climber that Norma had raised from a tiny cutting and nursed tenderly for years.

CHAPTER XXVI

—EMMA TAKES CHARGE—

AT 3 o'clock she decided suddenly that she must have a new outfit for the wedding. It was an illogical feeling in some ways, since there was so little time. But she suddenly had a fancy to stand beside her man brand new from the top of her shining head to the tips of her toes.

Recklessly she dashed off to the shop where everybody knew her. To Mrs. Sutton, her favorite saleswoman, Norma confided that she was going to be married and must have a new outfit immediately. Mrs. Sutton flung herself into the spirit of the occasion. With her help Norma selected underthings of a sheer, cobwebby texture, a suit of what Mrs. Sutton called "Madonna blue," with a hat and slippers and gloves all to match. There was also a fitted overnight bag, into which Norma tucked a cream-colored satin nightgown and a negligee with frost-fine lace, little satin bows, and tiny clusters of hand-made flowers.

"It looks like a wedding cake," she admitted to Mrs. Sutton, who laughed and offered a small, hastily wrapped package.

"For the 'something old, something new, something borrowed and something blue'," she explained. "It's my own small gift. Norma, my dear, I do hope you will be very, very happy."

"Thank you," said Norma, and kissed her.

The next moment they were shy of each other, a little abashed by the gesture. But Norma saw that it was after 4 o'clock and, with her purchase loaded into a taxi, she fled.

When the taxi stopped at the house, she let the driver help her with the purchases. But at the door a strange Negro man said, "Here, Miss Norma, lemme carry 'em fo' you."

"Oh, you're Emma's nephew, Hosea. No, you can't be! I know Hosea," said Norma, feeling idiotic, because she couldn't imagine what this man was doing here.

"I's Silas, Miss Norma, Hosea's brother," answered the man, taking possession of the bundles.

Norma stepped into the house and stood still, startled. The place was literally a hive of activity. Men and women were working like mad, completing the housecleaning. New draperies had gone up in the living-room. There were bowls of flowers all over the place. Three women were busily completing the job of waxing the hall. They all glanced at Norma, their dark faces split with wide, friendly smiles, and went on with their work.

Silas had gone on up the stairs with her bundles, and Norma could only stand stupidly looking about her at the swift, deft hands that were restoring order to the chaos that the uncompleted housecleaning had created.

"For heaven's sake," she managed at last, "what's going on here?"

A voice from the kitchen called:

"Is dat Miss Norma?"

And one of the women waxing the hall said, "Yessum, Aunt Em."

The swing door burst open and Emma came out, wearing the air of a general ordering his troops into action.

"Honey, where you been?" demanded Emma importantly. "It's 'mo' 5 o'clock. Yo' guests be 'rivin' any minute—"

"Guests? Emma, what in the name of heaven does all this mean?" Norma gestured toward the busy horde.

"Well, honey, y'all can't git married in a house all tore up wid spring cleanin'," argued Emma reasonably. "So I just called up some of my friends on de telefoam and told 'em how it was—and here dey is, helpin' out."

"And the guests?" demanded Norma.

"Wellum, you can't git married without yo' friends." Emma pointed out, not quite meeting Norma's eyes. "So I just telefoamed around to folks I knowed would want to be here. And dey's all a-comin'—"

"But, Emma, we were going to be married in the garden with just father and Dr. Andrews—and you, of course—as witnesses."

Emma's face darkened. "What kind of a marriage is dat, Miss Norma?" she protested in high scorn. "Dat's all right fo' folks what marries while dey says to deyselves, 'Effen it don't work out, we can git a divorce.' Dat ain't yo' kind of marriage, Miss Norma. You ain't ever gwine marry again, no matter what happens, honey—I knows you so well, Miss Norma. An' when a gal marries, de one an' only time in her life, she want it to be somethin' pretty what she can remember all her life!"

"Aunt Em's right, Miss Norma," said the youngest of the women waxing the floor.

"Sho' is, honey—she sho' is," another one murmured.

Emma shot them a dark look, as though they had disagreed with her. "You gals git on wid yo' work. You want de quality to git nere 'fo' you got dis hall finished?"

She turned to Norma, and her tone was authoritative. "You run on upstairs, honey, and git yo'self all prettied up. Marse Tim be here any minute."

And, laughing helplessly, her eyes wet with tears for the unaffected love and devotion this woman had given her through all her life, Norma obeyed.

The Madonna blue suit was devastatingly becoming. The trig little hat with its floating wisp of veil was definitely intriguing. The small package Mrs. Sutton had given her proved to hold a pair of dainty blue garters. There was also a handkerchief of very fine linen, daintily embroidered, a brooch of seed pearls which Norma knew had been "gift of the groom" from Mrs. Sutton's husband, dead these 10 years, and which was at once the "something borrowed" and the "something old" for her wedding outfit. She must remember to leave it in its little box so that her father could return it to Mrs. Sutton tomorrow.

She was dressed and ready when Emma, aggressively starched and crackling with cleanliness in her white uniform, voluminous cap and apron, came rustling in with a corsage bouquet of white orchids showered with valley lilies.

"Marse Tim done sent 'em," she reported, her eyes widening at sight of her mistress. "Honey you do look sweet! I ain't ever gonna git over it dat you ain't bein' married in white satin with a lace veil and a heap of pretty gals in pink and blue dresses, makin' eyes at a lot of handsome young mens!"

"This is wartime, Emma," Norma reminded her.

"Yessum. Like I didn't know it—buyin' two and a half pounds of sugar at a time. Who expect folks to cook wid a li'l old bit of sugar like dat?" Emma scowled. "And de grocery man refusin' to make mo' dan one trip a day out here—how come I don't know it's wartime?"

"Let's just hope, Emma," said Norma, "that we don't have to make any greater sacrifices than those! You've heard about the things that are happening to people in countries that have been captured by Hitler and the Japanese!"

"Yessum—I heard!" admitted Emma grimly. "Only dat don't make it no easier fo' me to bake a cake without sugar!"

"Then we'll get along without cakes, Emma. It will be good for our figures!" said Norma firmly.

Emma glanced at Norma, slim and graceful, and the mirrored reflection of her own shapeless girth. Suddenly she guffawed.

"Maybe be better fo' yo' figure, Miss Norma—but I ain't never had one!" she admitted with perfect good humor.

THERE was a tap at the door and Judge Stewart came in, his eyes taking Norma in with loving appreciation.

"Is it time?" she asked.

"It's time," he answered, and held out his arm. "The place is practically spilling over with eager well-wishers—and Tim looks as though he would explode in another moment of being surveyed by them, and people wondering what in the world Norma sees in that fellow."

"More likely they are wondering what he sees in Norma," said Norma, laughing.

Norma lifted her face and closed her eyes above the tears, saying softly, "I'll be back very soon—before you have a chance to miss me."

The judge put his arm about her and kissed her.

"I'll miss you from the moment you step foot out of the house. But I am joying in your joy, my dear. You'll come back and we'll wait for him together."

She clung to him for a moment, and then she straightened, smiled at him.

"Let's get going—before I burst into idiotic tears and spoil my make-up!"

When they reached the foot of the stairs, Norma realized that the house was packed with guests. Men and women who turned eagerly, smiling at her. She had not realized that she had so many friends. Yet here she had lived all her life, and she had been a good friend and neighbor, gentle and unassuming and asking nothing in return. Practically the entire town had gathered for her wedding on such short notice and she was deeply touched by this evidence of affection.

They made a little lane through which she and her father walked. Tim stood waiting for them in front of an improvised altar banked in white potted flowers and tall candles. From then on Norma was conscious of nothing save Tim's eyes that worshipped her as she walked toward him, of Tim's hand that held hers firmly and strongly, yet somehow gently.

There was a veritable parade of cars behind them as they drove to the airport, and there was such a flurry of good wishes and congratulations that at the last they had almost to be lifted aboard the plane. As it taxied down the runway and lifted into the air, Norma looked down at the rapidly dwindling town and the sea of upturned faces, before she settled down into her seat, her hand firmly in Tim's.

After a long moment, Tim said jealously, "They're worth more than a penny, I know—how about two bits for 'em?"

"My thoughts?" Norma lifted a radiant face to him. "I'm pretending that there isn't any war; that this is just an old-fashioned honeymoon. That someone has lent us a cottage somewhere, and that we'll spend several heavenly weeks there. Then when we come back, it will be to New York, and we'll have a smart apartment. You'll go down to the office at 8.30 and come home at 5—or do newspaper men have regular hours? If not, I can adjust myself--"

Tim said, very low, "Darling sweet! I love you. We'll make all that come true—some day."

"Yes," said Norma, confident. "Some day."

THE END

SATAN BRAIL they called him—not because he was an outlaw but because his shadowy past and a lightning gun hand did not make for easy confidences. And Brail did not care for confidences . . . something else drove him on. It was gold, fabulous piles of Aztec gold found and lost again by his dead father that haunted him relentlessly. And when he broke his own rule and meddled in the affairs of other men, it was hot lead and sudden death that flared around him as retribution . . . plus the scorn of a blue-eyed girl who believed that he was tainted with the outlaw brand. Here is a robust Western story, packed with blazing action that thunders to an explosive conclusion.
